CASES

ARGUED AND DECIDED

IN THE

SUPREME COURT

OF THE

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1919.

Vol. 251.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1–15.)

Evidence — sufficiency — railway land grant — fraudulent representations — oil lands.

1. An attempt to obtain a patent for lands within the indemnity limits of the Southern Pacific Railroad land grant of July 27, 1866, by representing that the lands were not mineral, when the railway company's officers believed the fact was otherwise, is shown by evidence that when the patent was sought and obtained the lands had no substantial value unless for oil mining; that the interest and anxiety displayed by the company's officers in securing the patent were wholly disproportionate to the value of the lands for any other purpose; that the lands lay within a recognized and productive oil region which the company's geologists had been systematically examining to determine in what lands oil was to be expected; and that upon the advice and recommendation of such geologists the company was treating and dealing with adjacent lands, of which it was the owner, as valuable for oil.

Public lands — cancelation of patent — railway land grant — fraudulent representations — oil lands.

2. Lands within the indemnity limits of the Southern Pacific Railroad land grant of July 27, 1866, were known to the railway company to be valuable for oil when the patent therefor was sought and obtained, so as to justify cancelation of the patent at the suit of the government, where the known conditions at that time were such as reasonably to engender the belief that the lands contained oil of such quality and in such quantity as would render its extraction profitable and justify expenditures to that end.

[For other cases, see Public Lands, I. 1; I. c, 2, i, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Public lands — railroad land grants — indemnity selections — mineral lands.

3. A report of a special agent of the General Land Office as to the nonmineral character of certain lands which were thereafter selected by the Southern Pacific Railway Company as within the indemnity limits of the land grant of July 27, 1866, did not relieve the railway company from showing before the Land Department that the lands selected were not mineral.

[For other cases, see Public Lands, I. c, 2, e; I. f, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued March 5 and 6, 1919. Decided November 17, 1919.

APPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a decree which reversed, with directions to dismiss the bill, a decree of the District Court for the Southern District of the Northern Division of California in favor of the United States in a suit to cancel a patent to public lands issued to a railway company upon certain indemnity selections. Reversed, and decree of District Court affirmed.

See same case below, 162 C. C. A. 19, 249 Fed. 785.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.—On setting aside land patents for fraud—see note to Miller v. Kerr, 5 L. ed. U. S. 381.

On land grants to railroads, generally—see note to Kansas P. R. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 L. ed. U. S. 794.

Mr. J. Crawford Biggs, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and Assistant Attorney General Kearful, argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant:

In a suit to annul a patent as fraudulently covering mineral lands, belief as to mineral character is established by proof that the known conditions at the time of the proceedings which resulted in the patent were plainly such as to engender the belief that the lands contained mineral deposits of such quality and in such quantity as would render their extraction profitable, and justify expenditures to that end; and this rule applies to oil lands.

Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236, 239, 58 L. ed. 936, 939, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507; Cowell v. Lammers, 10 Sawy. 246, 21 Fed. 200; Davis v. Wiebbold, 139 U. S. 507, 35 L. ed. 238, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628; Cosmos Exploration Co. v. Gray Eagle Oil Co. 104 Fed. 20; Francœur v. Newhouse, 40 Fed. 618.

A suit brought by the United States to cancel a patent for fraud stands upon a different plane from the ordinary private suit to recover real estate.

Causey v. United States, 240 U. S. 399, 402, 60 L. ed. 711, 713, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365; Utah Power & Light Co. v. United States, 243 U. S. 389, 409, 61 L. ed. 791, 818, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387; United States v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233, 240, 29 L. ed. 110, 112, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 836.

A representation recklessly made without knowledge of its truth, but which is in reality false, is a fraudulent representation.

Smith v. Richards, 13 Pet. 26, 36, 10 L. ed. 42, 47; Cooper v. Schlesinger, 111 U. S. 148, 155, 28 L. ed. 382, 384, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360; Lehigh Zinc & I. Co. v. Bamford, 150 U. S. 665, 673, 37 L. ed. 1215, 1217, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 219; Wecker v. National Enameling & Stamping Co. 204 U. S. 176, 185, 51 L. ed. 430, 435, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, 9 Ann. Cas. 757; Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 277, 30 L. ed. 170, 172, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1041.

The fraudulent manner in which the Southern Pacific acquired patent to the lands involved in the Tulare Oil Company contest is in keeping with its fraudulent conduct in securing patent for the lands now sued for.

Tulare Oil & Min. Co. v. Southern P. R. Co. 29 Land Dec. 269; Wood v. United States, 16 Pet. 342, 10 L. ed. 987; Mudsill Min. Co. v. Watrous, 9 C. C. A. 415, 22 U. S. App. 12, 61 Fed. 163, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 1; Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 38 L.R.A. 33, 19 C. C. A. 286, 37 U. S. App. 692, 72 Fed. 413; Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 248, 58 L. ed. 943, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507.

A man who has made a false representation in respect to a material matter must, in order to rely on the defense that the transaction was not entered into on the faith of the representation, be able to prove to a demonstration that it was not relied on.

Kerr, F. & Mistake, 3d ed. 75; Pollock, Torts, 292; Griffin v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. 140 N. C. 514, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 463, 53 S. E. 307; Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 895.

The representation need not be the sole inducement.

Hindman v. First Nat. Bank, 57 L.R.A. 108, 50 C. C. A. 623, 112 Fed. 931; Sioux Nat. Bank v. Norfolk State Bank, 5 C. C. A. 448, 12 U. S. App. 347, 56 Fed. 139.

The proceedings resulting in the patent were ex parte, no issue was framed, no hearing was had, and the patent is not conclusive against the government, but it may cancel the patent by showing that it was obtained by means of false and fraudulent proofs.

Washington Securities Co. v. United States, 234 U. S. 76, 58 L. ed. 1220, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 725; United States v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233, 29 L. ed. 110, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 836; J. J. McCaskill Co. v. United States, 216 U. S. 504, 509, 54 L. ed. 590, 594, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 386; Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236, 239, 58 L. ed. 936, 939, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507.

Mr. Charles R. Lowers argued the cause, and, with Messrs. William F. Herrin and Joseph P. Blair, filed a brief for appellees:

Opinion or surmise that oil might exist, at an unknown depth, from 4 to 10 miles from its nearest known occurrence, is not convincing proof that the conditions in 1904 were plainly such as to engender the belief that the land contained mineral deposits of such quality and in such quantity as would render their extraction profitable, and justify expenditures to that end.

Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236, 239, 58 L. ed. 936, 939, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507.

It was the duty of the government to prove its case by that class of evidence which commands respect, and with that amount of it which produces conviction.

Maxwell Land-Grant Case, 121 U. S. 325, 379–381, 30 L. ed. 949–959, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1015.

Only those lands may be lawfully taken from the railroad company which were in fact mineral lands at the time of patent. The expression "mineral lands," as here used, is no longer open to question. It includes only such lands as were, at the time of the grant (patent), known to be so valuable for their minerals as to justify expenditure for their extraction.

Davis v. Wiebbold, 139 U. S. 507, 524, 35 L. ed. 238, 244, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628; Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 29 L. ed. 423, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95; Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236, 239, 58 L. ed. 936, 939, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507.

A mineral patent would not issue for a single acre in the Elk hills on the showing of mineral made by the government in this case. This is so because the evidence is not sufficient to prove a discovery of mineral.

Chrisman v. Miller, 197 U. S. 313, 49 L. ed. 770, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468.

Far more proof is required to take land out of the category established by its nonmineral patent than is required to establish a miner's "discovery."

Ibid.

Without legal damage to the government there can be no relief on the ground of fraud. This is the rule which this court has applied in a similar suit by a private individual (Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 247, 31 L. ed. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 435). The same rule has been held to apply in suits by the government itself.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by the United States to cancel a patent issued December 12, 1904, to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for eight full and two partial sections of land within the indemnity limits of the grant made to that company by an act of Congress of July 27, 1866, chap. 278, 14 Stat. at L. 292, it being charged in the bill that the railroad company [7] fraudulently obtained the patent by falsely representing to the Land Department that the lands were not mineral but agricultural, when it was known that they were mineral. From the evidence presented the district court found that the charge was true, and entered a decree of cancelation, and this was reversed by the circuit court of appeals, one judge dissenting. 162 C. C. A. 19, 249 Fed. 785.

"All mineral lands" other than those containing coal or iron were excluded from the grant, and this exclusion embraced oil lands. Burke v. Southern P. R. Co. 234 U. S. 669, 676–679, 58 L. ed. 1527, 1543, 1544, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 907. As will be seen presently, there can be no doubt that the patent was procured by representing that the lands were not mineral. Whether this representation was false turns upon the character of the lands as known when the patent was sought and obtained. If they then were known to be valuable for oil, as the government asserts they were, they were mineral in the sense of the granting act.

To compensate for losses to the grant within its primary limits the railroad company was entitled to select other lands of like area within the indemnity limits, approval by the Secretary of the Interior being essential to passing the selections to patent. The established mode of making the selections was by presenting at the local land office selection lists designating the lands lost and those selected, with supporting affidavits showing, among other things, that the lands selected were of the character contemplated; that is to say, were not mineral but agricultural. These lists and affidavits would then be examined in that office and in the General Land Office, and ultimately the selections would be passed to the Secretary of the Interior for his action. That course was followed here.

The original list was presented November 14, 1903, but it encountered obstacles which led to the presentation of a substituted list covering the same lands on September 6, 1904. [8] Both lists were presented by the company's land agent, Mr. Eberlein, and were accompanied by affidavits made by him, stating that the lands selected "are not interdicted mineral," but "are of the character contemplated by the grant," and that "he has caused" them "to be carefully examined by the agents and employees of said company as to their mineral or agricultural character, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief none of the lands returned in said list are mineral lands." In acting on the substituted list, the officers of the Land Department relied upon and gave effect to the statements in supporting affidavits, and the selections were accordingly approved and passed to patent.

In truth, Mr. Eberlein had not examined the lands or caused them to be examined by others. Nor had any examination of them been made on behalf of the railroad company, save such as is inferable from the conduct of its geologists and others presently to be noticed.

The lands were in the Elk hills in Kern county, California; were rough, semiarid, and unfit for cultivation; were devoid of timber, springs, or running water, and had but little value for grazing. Oil had been discovered in that region as early as 1899, and this had been followed by development and production on an extensive scale. In 1903 and 1904 there were many producing wells about 25 miles to the east, and many within a much shorter distance to the west and south, some within 3 or 4 miles. The railroad company was then maintaining a corps of geologists,—all informed by experience in the California oil fields,—and under their supervision was searching for, developing, and producing oil for fuel purposes. In 1902, upon the recommendation of one of its geologists, it withdrew from sale many of its patented lands surrounding and adjacent to those in suit "because they were in or near oil territory;" and early in 1903 it entered upon a systematic examination of its lands in [9] that territory "to determine as far as can be done from surface indications and geological structure where oil is to be expected in this region." In a letter to Mr. Kruttschnitt, one of the company's vice presidents, the chief geologist said, when about to take up the examination: "So far as I can judge from the trip I have just made over this territory, this work promises results of greatest value to the company."

The lands in suit were surveyed in 1901, and the approved plat was filed in the local land office in May, 1903. The field notes denominated the lands as mineral, and described them as in a mineral district "within which many successful oil wells have been developed." As before stated, the original selection list was presented November 14, 1903. Mr. Kruttschnitt already had written to the company's attorney at Washington, requesting that "special attention" be given to securing a patent for the lands when selected; and shortly thereafter Mr. Eberlein wrote to the attorney, saying: "I am particularly anxious in regard to this list, as the lands adjoin the oil territory, and Mr. Kruttschnitt is very solicitous in regard to it." Other letters and telegrams show that this special concern or anxiety persisted until the patent was issued.

In 1903 the company concluded to lease such of its lands as were considered "valuable for oil purposes" to a subsidiary company which was to be a sort of fuel department, and to have charge of the development and production of oil. The geologists were requested to designate the lands to be thus leased, and as a result of their investigation and recommendation several sections adjacent to and some immediately adjoining those in suit were included. The lease was to be signed on behalf of the railroad company by Mr. Eberlein as land agent, and was laid before him for that purpose on August 2, 1904. Perceiving at once that its execution would not be in accord [10] with his action in pressing the pending selection list, he took the matter up with some of his superiors. To one he said in a letter: "We have selected a large body of lands interspersed with the lands sought to be conveyed by this lease, and which we have represented as nonmineral in character. Should the existence of this lease become known, it would go a long way toward establishing the mineral character of the lands referred to, and which are still unpatented. We could not successfully resist a mineral filing after we have practically established the mineral character of the land. I would suggest delay at least until this matter of patent can be adjusted." To the same officer he protested against the action of the geologists in examining unpatented lands because "it was charging the company with notice." And to another, in New York, he explained "all phases of the matter," with the result that the "impropriety of the lease at that time" and the "very ambiguous position in which we would be placed" were recognized, and he was instructed to withhold his signature and to place and keep all correspondence and papers relating to the lease in a separate and private file not accessible to others. He followed the instruction and the special or secret file remained in his possession "until," as he testified, "it was pried out" at the hearing.

But notwithstanding what was brought to his attention through the proposed oil lease, Mr. Eberlein continued actively to press the pending selection, and when, about a month later, he presented the substituted selection list, it was accompanied by affidavits wherein he repeated his prior representation that the lands were not mineral. After presenting this list he had a conference with the chief geologist which prompted the latter, when writing to a superior officer, to explain that "for reasons of policy regarding certain unpatented lands it will be best not to execute the lease . . . at present."

[11] The lease was placed by Mr. Eberlein in the special or secret file, and some time afterward, when an effort was made to find it, he denied all knowledge of it. The denial was brought to the attention of the chief geologist, and he at once wrote to Mr. Eberlein, calling attention to the conference just mentioned, and stating: "You explained that you were rushing certain lands for final patent, and that the immediate execution of the lease showing our idea of what were oil lands might interfere with you, and we agreed to defer the execution until that danger was passed." The chief geologist was a witness at the hearing, and when asked what danger was meant, answered: "The danger that these lands might be delayed and not be patented because of their mineral character."

All that has been recited thus far is proved so well that it is beyond dispute. Fairly considered, it shows that when the patent was sought and obtained the lands had no substantial value unless for oil mining; that the interest and anxiety displayed by the company's officers in securing the patent were wholly disproportionate to the value of the lands for any other purpose; that the lands lay within a recognized and productive oil region which the company's geologists had been systematically examining to determine in what lands oil was to be expected, and that upon the advice and recommendation of its geologists the company was treating and dealing with adjacent and adjoining lands, of which it was the owner, as valuable for oil. Of course among practical men the character—whether oil or otherwise—of these adjacent and adjoining lands had some bearing on the character of those in suit, and this was given pointed recognition when the company's officers halted the signing of the proposed oil lease pending action on the selection list, and caused the correspondence and papers relating to the lease to be secreted in a special and private file.

We think the natural, if not the only, conclusion from [12] all this, is that, in pressing the selection, the officers of the railroad company were not acting in good faith, but were attempting to obtain the patent by representing that the lands were not mineral when they believed the fact was otherwise.

The observable geological and other physical conditions at the time of the patent proceedings, as shown by the evidence, were as follows: The area called the Elk hills was about 6 miles wide and 15 long, and constituted an anticlinal fold or elongated dome,—an occurrence favorable to the accumulation and retention of oil. The lands in suit were about its center. From 5 to 10 miles to the west was the Temblor range, the main uplift of that region. Along the east flank of that uplift for a distance of 30 miles was a series of outcrops or exposures of Monterey (diatomaceous) shales, the source of oil in California, and porous sandstone in which oil generally finds its ultimate reservoir. These strata were of exceptional thickness, and it was apparent that oil in considerable quantity had been seeping or wasting from the sandstone. The dip of the strata was towards the Elk hills, and there were no indications of any faulting or thinning in that direction. Between the outcrop and the Elk hills upwards of two hundred wells had found the oil-bearing strata and were being profitably operated, several of the wells being on a direct line towards the lands in suit and within 3 or 4 miles of them. In and beyond the Elk hills were oil seepages and other surface indications of the existence of oil in the underlying strata, one of the seepages being near the lands in suit. Two wells had been sunk in the Elk hills, but obviously had not gone to an adequate depth and were not productive, although some oil was reached by one.

Geologists and men of wide experience and success in oil mining—all of whom had examined that territory and [13] some of whom had been familiar with it for years—were called as witnesses by the government, and gave it as their opinion, having regard to the known conditions in 1903 and 1904, as just outlined, that the lands were valuable for oil, in that an ordinarily prudent man, understanding the hazards and rewards of oil mining, and desiring to engage therein for profit, would be justified in purchasing the lands for such mining and making the expenditures incident to their development, and in that a competent geologist or expert in oil mining, if employed to advise in the matter, would have ample warrant for advising the purchase and expenditure.

Other geologists and oil operators, called by the company, gave it as their opinion that the lands were not, under the conditions stated, valuable for oil: but, as respects the testimony of some, it is apparent that they were indisposed to regard any lands as within that category until they were demonstrated to be certainly such by wells actually drilled thereon and producing oil in paying quantities after a considerable period of pumping. This is a mistaken test, in that it takes no account of geological conditions, adjacent discoveries, and other external conditions upon which prudent and experienced men in the oil mining regions are shown to be accustomed to act and make large expenditures. And the testimony of some of these witnesses is weakened by the fact that their prior acts in respect of these lands, or others in that vicinity similarly situated, were not in accord with the opinions which they expressed.

After considering all the evidence, we think it is adequately shown that the lands were known to be valuable for oil when the patent was sought and obtained, and by this we mean that the known conditions at that time were such as reasonably to engender the belief that the lands contained oil of such quality and in such quantity as would render its extraction profitable, and justify expenditures [14] to that end. See Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236, 58 L. ed. 936, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507.

The railroad company places some reliance on the fact that after the presentation of the original selection list, and before the substituted one was tendered, a special agent of the General Land Office examined the lands and reported them as nonmineral. But there is nothing in this that can help the company. The agent's report was made in another connection, and was not considered by the land officers when they approved the selection. It did not relieve the company from showing that the lands selected were not mineral; nor did the company understand that it had any such effect. Mr. Eberlein knew of the report several months before he and other officers of the company became troubled over the proposed oil lease and concluded that, if given publicity, it would endanger the pending selection. Besides, if the report could be considered here, it would be without any real evidential value, for it appears from testimony given by the agent at the hearing that he was not a geologist or familiar with oil mining, and that his examination of the lands was at best only superficial.

The company makes the contention that drilling done since the patent was issued has demonstrated that the lands have no value for oil. Assuming, without so deciding, that the contention would help the company if sustained by the evidence, we think it is not sustained. The drilling relied upon was done after 1909 upon lands in the Elk hills other than those in suit. Several wells were started and not more than three were successful. The three were the only ones that were drilled in favorable locations and to an adequate depth, and they penetrated oil sands of considerable thickness and produced a large quantity of oil, but were shut down for reasons not made clear by the record. They were drilled by an oil company which was controlled by the railroad company. [15] The other wells failed for reasons which prevent the outcome from having any significance here. In some the drilling was not carried to an adequate depth because the right to proceed was thought to be uncertain by reason of an executive withdrawal of the lands.

We conclude that the application of prior decisions to the case made by the evidence entitles the government to the relief sought, as was held by the district court. See United States v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233, 29 L. ed. 110, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 836; J. J. McCaskill Co. v. United States, 216 U. S. 504, 54 L. ed. 590, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 388; Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. Homicide — first degree — mitigation of punishment.

1. A conviction for murder as charged in the indictment, which embraced the elements constituting murder in the first degree, is not rendered less than one for first-degree murder merely because the jury exercised its right, under the Criminal Code, § 330, to mitigate the punishment to imprisonment for life.

Argued October 22, 1919. Decided November 24, 1919.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a conviction for murder in the first degree. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Martin J. O'Donnell argued the cause, and, with Mr. Isaac B. Kimbrell, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy incorporated in the phrase of the 5th Amendment, "nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life," is a prohibition directed to the courts of the United States, which operates to deprive them of jurisdiction to try any person more than once for his life for the same offense, and neither the consent of the defendant nor the action of any department of the government can operate to confer upon the courts a jurisdiction thus denied by the organic law.

Rep. 9; Shepherd v. People, 25 N. Y. 406; People v. Comstock, 8 Wend. 549.

The plaintiff in error did not bring about the destruction of the former verdict or judgment. The United States, acting through its Solicitor General, filed a motion moving that the court reverse the judgment, and in pursuance of the confession and motion on the part of the United States the judgment was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Consequently the fallacious doctrine of waiver of former jeopardy does not fit the facts of this case.

To hold that a person convicted of a capital crime by prosecuting a writ of error waives his right to rely on the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy is to hold that this constitutional guaranty can never be invoked by a person so convicted.

Rule three of this court requires it to follow the former practice of the court of King's bench; and as that rule has not been altered or modified since its adoption, either by the court or by act of Congress, as to capital crimes, it was without power to award a trial de novo on the former writ of error.

The former verdict disposed of two issues in the case: first, guilty as charged; second, acquittal of the species of charge warranting capital punishment. The former writ of error to this court was prosecuted from the judgment on the phase of the verdict finding defendant guilty of the crime. Therefore the verdict acquitting the defendant of the species warranting the infliction of the death penalty remains in full force and effect.

The district court of the United States is empowered by § 53 of the Judicial Code, upon the application of a defendant in a criminal case, to transfer the cause for trial to another division of the district, and the denial of a defendant's application for such transfer is error fatal to the verdict in a case where it appears that, because of prejudice against him on the part of the inhabitants of the division in which the trial was had, defendant cannot have a trial by an impartial jury such as the Constitution contemplates.

Coal & Min. Co. v. Jones, 75 Ark. 76, 87 S. W. 440.

The district court deprived defendant of his right to a trial by an impartial jury of the state and district of Kansas, by refusing to quash the jury panel where it appeared that the district attorney, in attempting to force a trial during the absence of defendant's counsel, while they were unavoidably detained in the trial of a cause in an adjoining state before a court of general jurisdiction, made and caused his affidavit to be read in the hearing of the panel, reciting his unwarranted conclusion that defendant's said counsel had deserted their client, the defendant, and that they had proposed to enter a plea of guilty, and where it appeared that the judge of said court, during the unavoidable absence of defendant's counsel, denounced them in the presence and hearing of the panel as being guilty of professional misconduct, declaring that if they were within the jurisdiction of that district court, he would order them into custody of the marshal, thus and thereby depriving defendant of his constitutional right to be tried for his life by an impartial jury of the state and district where the homicide was alleged to have been committed.

The law will presume prejudice in a case where the court refused to sustain defendant's challenge for cause, and defendant was compelled to use his peremptory challenges to exclude a juror properly challenged for cause, where, before the jury was sworn, the peremptory challenges were exhausted.

People v. Weil, 40 Cal. 268; Trenor v. Central P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 222; Hubbard v. Rutledge, 57 Miss. 7; State v. Brown, 15 Kan. 400, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 423.

This for the very plain reason that the act of the court in refusing to sustain a challenge for cause, and thereby compelling the defendant to use his peremptory challenge to exclude a juror, necessarily, by this conduct, denies to defendant that peremptory challenge which the law allows as his absolute right.

Boles v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 398; Williams v. State, 32 Miss. 390, 66 Am. Dec. 615; Finn v. State, 5 Ind. 400; Van Blaricum v. People, 16 Ill. 364, 63 Am. Dec. 316.

The court, by refusing to sustain defendant's challenges for cause, which were well founded, deprived the defendant of the right to the twenty challenges allowed by the statute, and thereafter denied him the right to the thirty-five challenges allowed by the Constitution, in which the common-law rule on this subject is incorporated.

Lewis v. United States, 146 U. S. 376, 36 L. ed. 1014, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; 4 Bl. Com. p. 354.

It is error in a first-degree murder case in a court of the United States to sustain the challenge of the government to a juror qualified under the law of the state in which the court sits to be a juror in a first-degree murder case for the reasons (a) that § 275 of the Penal Code requires that the qualifications of jurors in the state courts shall determine their qualifications in the United States courts, and (b) by virtue of § 330, the command of the law as to the measure of punishment for such crime is fulfilled by a verdict of guilty, with the words "without capital punishment" added thereto.

Conscientious scruples against capital punishment are not a ground for challenge by the state, where the jury are given the option to substitute imprisonment for the death penalty.

State v. Lee, 91 Iowa, 499, 60 N. W. 119; State v. Garrington, 11 S. D. 178, 76 N. W. 326; Winston v. United States, 172 U. S. 310, 43 L. ed. 459, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 212; State v. Ellis, 98 Ohio St. 21, 120 N. E. 218.

But a juror may be examined as to his scruples as a basis for peremptory challenge.

889; State v. Dooley, 89 Iowa, 584, 57 N. W. 414.

The court erred in proceeding with the trial, for the reason that it affirmatively appears from the record that a list of the jurors was not served on the defendant two entire days before the trial began, or at all, and the rule for securing an impartial jury prescribed by the Statutes of William (7 Wm. III. chap. 3) and Anne (7 Ann. chap. 21), and incorporated in the 6th Amendment, and categorically adopted by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1033, Comp. Stat. § 1699, 2 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 688, was violated.

Because of the failure of the indictment to categorically specify the degree of murder charged in the language of the statute, defendant's rights under the 6th Amendment, guaranteeing that he be informed of the nature and cause of all accusations, were violated.

The court erred in that, in its charge to the jury, it limited the jury in its consideration of the issue of self-defense to the testimony of defendant's witnesses alone, and prevented the jury from considering all the facts and circumstances in the case on that issue, as detailed in the evidence of the witnesses for the government.

The trial court erred in refusing to order the return, and in admitting in evidence, over the objection and exception of the defendant, the letters deposited by Stroud with officers of the government for transmission through the mails, because "the law of the case" had been declared by this court.

The decision of the district court denying defendant's petition for the return of his letters after it had taken jurisdiction of the subject-matter set forth in the petition, and found that said letters had come into possession of the government as the result of its own unlawful act in unlawfully seizing them and confiscating them by its warden, and admitting the same in evidence, in violation of its own Constitution, was reversible error.

If a challenge to the array because of alleged prejudice in the whole panel be permissible at all in the Federal courts (which is certainly doubtful), the matter is clearly within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its action is not reviewable on error except upon a clear showing of abuse of such discretion. No such showing is made in this record. The court could lawfully permit the jury to be present at the hearing of the motion for continuance (Holt v. United States, 218 U. S. 245, 54 L. ed. 1021, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2, 20 Ann. Cas. 1138), and nothing occurred at such hearing which can fairly be said to have prejudiced them.

Where a case is reversed and remanded for a new trial on confession of error by the state, there is no law of the case further than this, viz., that the defendant shall have a new trial. The reasons for the confessions of error are given above in the statement of this case, and the errors confessed were avoided on the retrial. This court knows what it intended by its mandate, and that the trial court obeyed it.

Holmgren v. United States, 217 U. S. 509, 54 L. ed. 861, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 588, 19 Ann. Cas. 778.

The letters of defendant were properly admitted in evidence.

Johnson v. United States, 228 U. S. 457, 57 L. ed. 919, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 572; Perlman v. United States, 247 U. S. 7, 62 L. ed. 950, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 417.

The defendant cannot now successfully contend that he has been placed in jeopardy in either of the two former trials. He procured the writ of error in each case, upon which the judgments against him were set aside and the case remanded for proceedings de novo.

Trono v. United States, 199 U. S. 521, 50 L. ed. 292, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 4 Ann. Cas. 773; United States v. Ball, 163 U. S. 662, 41 L. ed. 300, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1192.

The provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1033, Comp. Stat. § 1699, 2 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 688, that when a person is indicted for a capital offense, a list of the jurors, etc., shall be delivered to him at least two entire days before the trial, is not applicable to veniremen called upon special venire. The record in this case does not disclose an objection on the part of the defendant to proceeding with the trial until a list of the names of the ten additional special veniremen was served upon him. Neither does it appear in the record that the defendant insisted upon such list. The right secured to the defendant under § 1033 may be waived.

Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263, 36 L. ed. 429, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Hickory v. United States, 151 U. S. 303, 38 L. ed. 170, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334; Johnson v. United States, 225 U. S. 405, 56 L. ed. 1142, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 748; Goldsby v. United States, 160 U. S. 70, 40 L. ed. 343, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 216.

The section last referred to is not applicable to veniremen called upon special venire for the purpose of completing the panel, where the same has been exhausted by challenge or excused jurors.

Stewart v. United States, 127 C. C. A. 477, 211 Fed. 41.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

Robert F. Stroud was indicted for the killing of Andrew Turner. The indictment embraced the elements constituting murder in the first degree. The homicide took place in the United States prison at Leavenworth, Kansas, where Stroud was a prisoner and Turner a guard. The record discloses that Stroud killed Turner by stabbing him with a knife which he carried concealed on his person.

Stroud was convicted in May, 1916, of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged. Upon confession of error by the United States district attorney the circuit court of appeals reversed this judgment. Stroud was [17] again tried at the May term, 1917, the jury in the verdict rendered found Stroud "guilty as charged in the indictment without capital punishment." Upon writ of error to this court the Solicitor General of the United States confessed error, and the judgment was reversed; the mandate commanded: "Such further proceedings be had in said cause, in conformity with the judgment of this court, as according to right and justice, and the laws of the United States, ought to be had, the said writ of error notwithstanding." In pursuance of this mandate the district court issued an order vacating the former sentence, and ordered a new trial. The trial was had, the jury found Stroud guilty of murder in the first degree as charged in the indictment, making no recommendation dispensing with capital punishment. Upon this verdict sentence of death was pronounced. This writ of error is prosecuted to reverse the judgment.

The case is brought directly to this court because of assignments of error alleged to involve the construction and application of the Constitution of the United States. The argument has taken a wide range. We shall dispose of such assignments of error as we deem necessary to consider in justice to the contentions raised in behalf of the plaintiff in error.

It is alleged that the last trial of the case had the effect to put the plaintiff in error twice in jeopardy for the same offense, in violation of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. From what has already been said it is apparent that the indictment was for murder in the first degree; a single count thereof fully described that offense. Each conviction was for the offense charged. It is true that upon the second trial the jury added "without capital punishment" to its verdict, and sentence for life imprisonment was imposed. This recommendation was because of the right of the jury so to do under § 330 of the Criminal Code (35 Stat. at L. 1152, chap. 321, Comp. Stat. § 10,504, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 983). [18] This section permits the jury to add to the verdict, where the accused is found guilty of murder in the first degree, "without capital punishment," in which case the convicted person is to be sentenced to imprisonment for life. The fact that the jury may thus mitigate the punishment to imprisonment for life did not render the conviction less than one for first-degree murder. Fitzpatrick v. United States, 178 U. S. 304, 307, 44 L. ed. 1078, 1080, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 944.

The protection afforded by the Constitution is against a second trial for the same offense. Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872; Kepner v. United States, 195 U. S. 100, 49 L. ed. 114, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797, 1 Ann. Cas. 655, and cases cited in the opinion. Each conviction was for murder as charged in the indictment, which, as we have said, was murder in the first degree. In the last conviction the jury did not add the words "without capital punishment" to the verdict, although the court in its charge particularly called the attention of the jury to this statutory provision. In such case the court could do no less than inflict the death penalty. Moreover, the conviction and sentence upon the former trials were reversed upon writs of error sued out by the plaintiff in error. The only thing the appellate court could do was to award a new trial on finding error in the proceeding; thus the plaintiff in error himself invoked the action of the court which resulted in a further trial. In such cases he is not placed in second jeopardy within the meaning of the Constitution. Trono v. United States, 199 U. S. 521, 533, 50 L. ed. 292, 296, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 4 Ann. Cas. 773.

It is insisted that the court erred in not granting a change of venue. The plaintiff in error made a motion in the trial court, asking such an order. The chief grounds for the application appear to have been that the testimony for the government in the former trials had been printed and commented upon by the local press; that the evidence published was only such as the government had introduced, and its wide circulation by the medium of the press created prejudice in the minds of the inhabitants of Leavenworth [19] county against him, and that this prejudice existed to such an extent that the jury impaneled to try the case, though not inhabitants of Leavenworth county, were influenced more or less by the prejudice existing in that county against him; that at defendant's last trial the government, by issuing pardons to p isoners who claimed to have witnessed the homicide, produced only such witnesses as tended to support its theory of the guilt of the defendant of the crime of first-degree murder, and that at the same time the government invoked the rule that prisoners in the penitentiary who witnessed the homicide, being still prisoners under conviction and serving terms of more than one year, were not qualified witnesses on behalf of the defendant; that the cause was set for trial at a special term of the court beginning on May 20, 1918, and on said date the defendant's counsel were engaged in the state of Missouri in the trial of a cause; that the attorneys advised the judge of their inability to be present during the week the case was set for trial; that an affidavit, setting forth the above facts, was filed with the court, praying it not to enter upon the trial; that the counsel for the government submitted an affidavit in which it was stated that counsel for the defendant, Stroud, stated their wish and desire to escape further responsibility for the conduct of the defense, and expressed their hope that something would occur to make it unnecessary to appear longer in this cause in Stroud's behalf, and proposed that the government consent that the defendant plead guilty to the charge of second-degree murder, with the understanding that as a result thereof the court might sentence the defendant to prison for the remainder of his life; that said statement and affidavit were read in the presence and hearing of the special panel of prospective jurors in open court, said jurors being among those before whom the government proposed to put the defendant upon trial for murder; that at the close of the reading of the affidavit in the presence of the prospective [20] jurors, the district judge stated from the bench that, in view of the statements set forth in the affidavit, he was compelled to feel that counsel had acted unprofessionally by not being there in court, at least one of them; that said facts were commented upon by the public press of Leavenworth county, and created prejudice against defendant and his attorneys; that defendant never authorized any person or attorney to make any such proposal to attorneys for the government, concerning a plea of guilty, for the reason that the defendant was not guilty of the charge contained in the indictment, or of murder in any degree, and that unless the jurors who had theretofore attended the court during the week of May 20, 1918, were discharged by order of the court, the defendant could not enjoy the right of a public trial by an impartial jury secured to him by the Constitution, and prayed an order transferring the case to another division of the district. The court overruled the motion except in so far as it asked for an exclusion of inhabitants of Leavenworth county as jurors; to that extent it was sustained. The motion to quash the panel, called to act as jurors, was made on like grounds, and was also overruled.

The division in which Leavenworth county is situated consists of fifty counties, and, after hearing these applications, the district court excluded persons from the jury who were residents of Leavenworth county, and refused to quash the panel upon the grounds alleged. Matters of this sort are addressed to the discretion of the trial judge, and we find nothing in the record to amount to abuse of discretion such as would authorize an appellate court to interfere with the judgment. Kennon v. Gilmer, 131 U. S. 22, 24, 33 L. ed. 110, 111, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 696.

Certain jurors were challenged for cause upon the ground that they were in favor of nothing less than capital punishment in cases of conviction for murder in the first degree. It may well be that as to one of these jurors, one [21] Williamson, the challenge should have been sustained. This juror was peremptorily challenged by the accused, and did not sit upon the jury. The statute, in cases of this character, allowed the accused twenty peremptory challenges; it appears that he was in fact allowed twenty-two peremptory challenges. Thus his right to exercise peremptory challenges was not abridged to his prejudice by an erroneous ruling as to the challenge for cause. In view of this fact, and since there is nothing in the record to show that any juror who sat upon the trial was in fact objectionable, we are unable to discover anything which requires a reversal upon this ground. See Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 71, 30 L. ed. 578, 580, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350; Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S. 430, 30 L. ed. 708, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131, 31 L. ed. 80, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21, 22; Holt v. United States, 218 U. S. 245, 248, 54 L. ed. 1021, 1028, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2, 20 Ann. Cas. 1138.

Certain letters were offered in evidence at the trial containing expressions tending to establish the guilt of the accused. These letters were written by him after the homicide and while he was an inmate of the penitentiary at Leavenworth. They were voluntarily written, and under the practice and discipline of the prison were turned over ultimately to the warden, who furnished them to the district attorney. It appears that at the former trial, as well as the one which resulted in the conviction now under consideration, application was made for a return of these letters upon the ground that their seizure and use brought them within principles laid down in Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 58 L. ed. 652, L.R.A.1915B, 834, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1117, and kindred cases. But we are unable to discover any application of the principles laid down in those cases to the facts now before us. In this instance the letters were voluntarily written, no threat or coercion was used to obtain them, nor were they seized without process. They came into the possession of the officials of the penitentiary under established practice, reasonably designed to promote the discipline of the institution. Under such circumstances there was neither [22] testimony required of the accused, nor unreasonable search and seizure in violation of his constitutional rights.

Other objections are raised in the elaborate brief filed in behalf of the plaintiff in error. We do not find it necessary to discuss them. In view of the gravity of the case they have been examined and considered with care, and we are unable to find that any error was committed to the prejudice of the accused.

Affirmed.

Error to state court — when judgment is that of highest court.

1. A judgment of a California district court of appeal refusing certiorari to an inferior court is the judgment of the state court of last resort having power to consider the case so far as the appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court is concerned, where such appellate court assumed jurisdiction of the cause, and the supreme court of the state refused, for want of jurisdiction, to review the judgment, although the district court of appeal may have erred in assuming jurisdiction, since this is purely a question of state law.

Superior Court for the County of Sacramento, in that state, convicting a street railway company of violating a street sprinkling ordinance. Affirmed.

See same case below, 28 Cal. App. 412, 152 Pac. 928.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William B. Bosley submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The judgment of the district court of appeal which plaintiff in error seeks to have reviewed on this writ of error is a final judgment of the highest court of the state of California in which a decision in such case could be had, and is a decision in favor of the validity of a statute of the state of California, the validity of which was drawn in question in the district court of appeal on the ground that it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Therefore, under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States and § 237 of the Judicial Code, and on the authority of the decisions of this court in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 580, 50 L. ed. 596, 604, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175; Western Turf Asso. v. Greenberg, 204 U. S. 359, 362, 51 L. ed. 520, 522, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Ref. Co. 125 U. S. 18, 31, 31 L. ed. 607, 612, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 741, this court has jurisdiction to re-examine and reverse or affirm said judgment on this writ of error which was sued out by the plaintiff in error within the time allowed therefor by law.

The power of the several states of the Union, and their municipal corporations and political subdivisions, to levy and collect special or local assessments, is founded upon and limited by the existence of a special compensating benefit resulting to the owner of property benefited by the construction of some public improvement, to pay for which the assessment is levied.

Imposing upon those who own or operate railways in the streets of Sacramento the burden and expense of sprinkling a great part of such streets, while no corresponding burden is laid on the owners of such abutting property, denies to plaintiff in error and others who own and operate street railways in Sacramento the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It cannot be doubted that to compel a corporation to pay out its own money in performing a service to the public is to take its property for public use; nor that the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibits the states from taking private property for public use without just compensation.

This case clearly comes within the rule declared by this court in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Vosburg, 238 U. S. 56, 59, 59 L. ed. 1199, 1200, L.R.A.1915E, 953, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675, that the constitutional guaranty, i. e., the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment, entitles all persons and corporations within the jurisdiction of the state to the protection of equal laws, including laws enacted as police regulations.

State v. Jackman, 69 N. H. 318, 42 L.R.A. 438, 41 Atl. 347, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 607; Wilson v. United Traction Co. 72 App. Div. 233, 76 N. Y. Supp. 203.

The police power, when used in its broadest sense, is simply the power of government residing in every sovereign state; i. e., the power to create, define, and limit the political or legal rights and duties of human beings living in an organized civil society or state, and to control and regulate the conduct of such human beings in the exercise and enjoyment of their rights and the performance of their duties. So defined, the police power embraces the power of eminent domain, the power to coin money, the power to levy and collect taxes, the power to make war, the power to provide for the common defense, the power to regulate commerce, the power to create courts and to provide for the adjudication of controversies, and all of the other powers which, by reason of their having been the subject of special legislation from time immemorial, or by reason of their having been made the subject of special grants or limitations and restrictions in the Federal and state Constitutions, have come to be classified and given distinctive names by courts and the authors of legal treatises, and also embraces the great unclassified residuum of governmental power, inherent in the legal conception of sovereignty.

License Cases, 5 How. 504, 583, 12 L. ed. 256, 291; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 688, 43 L. ed. 858, 860, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 139, 9 L. ed. 648, 662.

The term "police power" is perhaps more frequently used in a narrower sense as embracing the power to make and enforce laws the object of which is so to control and regulate the conduct of human beings that they, in the exercise and enjoyment of their constitutional and legal rights with respect to life, liberty, and property, and in the performance of their constitutional and legal duties, shall avoid doing injury and causing damage to others.

Once it is determined that the statute whose validity is in question is not a legitimate exercise of the police power as last above defined, but, on the contrary, will, by its necessary operation, if enforced, be destructive of rights granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, this court does not hesitate to declare it void for repugnancy to that Constitution.

On the other hand, if it is determined that the statute whose validity is drawn in question is a legitimate and reasonable exercise of the police power as so defined, that is to say, a statute the natural and necessary effect of the enforcement of which will be simply to compel those coming within its operation to exercise their own rights under the Constitution and laws of the land in such manner as to avoid injury to other individuals and detriment to the public, then the fact that enforcement of the law involves some restriction of the individual's freedom of conduct, or some limitation upon his use and enjoyment of his property, or will subject him to substantial expense by compelling alterations in structures or the installation of safeguards, or will subject him to loss by prohibiting him from continuing to conduct, by means of his property, some special kind of business deemed inimical to the public welfare, e. g., the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, will not be deemed by this court to be a sufficient ground for holding such statute repugnant to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The cases involving the constitutionality of statutes enacted in the exercise of the police power, as so defined, may conveniently be divided into three classes, as follows, viz.: (1) Cases involving statutes whose constitutionality is drawn in question upon the ground that the direct object of their enactment and enforcement, whatever may have been the motive of the legislature in enacting them, or the indirect results intended to be accomplished by them, is one whose accomplishment is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. To this class belongs the case of Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 62 L. ed. 149, L.R.A.1918C, 210, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 16, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1201.

(2) Cases involving statutes whose constitutionality is drawn in question upon the ground that, even though the object sought to be accomplished by their enactment and enforcement is legitimate and meritorious, and even though the means provided for the accomplishment of such objects do not in principle come within any express prohibition of the Constitution of the United States, nevertheless they impose restrictions and burdens upon individuals in the exercise and enjoyment of their liberty, or in respect to their use and enjoyment of property, so unreasonable and oppressive as to be tantamount to a deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law. To this class belong the case of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Omaha, 235 U. S. 121, 59 L. ed. 157, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 82, and the other cases referred to above. In this class of cases the constitutionality of the statute is generally sustained, though in extreme cases such a statute, or an administrative order made pursuant thereto, may be declared void.

See Washington ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Fairchild, 224 U. S. 510, 56 L. ed. 863, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535.

Cases involving statutes whose constitutionality is drawn in question on the ground that, however legitimate and proper may be the ultimate object sought to be accomplished by their enactment and enforcement, the means employed to accomplish that object involve the taking of property from the owner for the private use of another, or the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or a denial of the equal protection of the laws, or an infringement of some other right secured by the Constitution of the United States. This class includes such cases as Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 455, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 185, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403, 41 L. ed. 489, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 130; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 217 U. S. 196, 54 L. ed. 727, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461, 18 Ann. Cas. 989; Great Northern R. Co. v. Minnesota, 238 U. S. 340, 59 L. ed. 1337, P.U.R. 1915D, 701, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 753; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Wisconsin, 238 U. S. 491, 59 L. ed. 1423, L.R.A. 1916A, 1133, P.U.R.1915D, 706, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869.

Dust is a menace to health.

Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 328, 38 L.R.A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93, 41 Pac. 411.

By ordinance the city of Sacramento made it the duty of "every person, firm or corporation owning, controlling or operating any street railroad, suburban railroad, or interurban railroad upon and along any of the streets of the city of Sacramento shall, without cost to the city during the months of June, July, August, September and October of each year, and at such other times as may be necessary to keep the dust laid, sprinkle with water the surface of the street, occupied by such railroad, between the rails and tracks and for a sufficient distance beyond the outermost rails thereof, so as to effectually lay the dust and prevent the same from arising when the cars are in operation."

The Gas Company, plaintiff in error, operated lines of street railway in Sacramento under franchise granted by the city. It refused to obey the ordinance and was prosecuted in the city police court, and there asserted that the ordinance was in conflict with the due process and equal protection of the laws clauses of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

From a sentence imposing upon it a money penalty, it appealed to the superior court for the county of Sacramento, and from the judgment of that court, confirming [24] the conviction, it prosecuted an appeal to the supreme court of the state, which court refused to review the case, on the ground that it was without jurisdiction. Thereupon the company, alleging the illegality of the conviction upon various grounds, among others, that the ordinance was repugnant to the 14th Amendment, petitioned the district court of appeal for the third appellate district for a writ of certiorari requiring the superior court to send up the record for review. The petition was demurred to as stating no cause of action and on the further ground that it disclosed no jurisdiction in the court to review. Although it expressed doubt on the subject, the court took jurisdiction, reviewed the conviction, held that the city had power under the state Constitution and laws to pass the ordinance, and that it was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The certiorari was refused. A review of this judgment was then asked at the hands of the supreme court of the state, but that court again refused to interfere, on the ground of its want of jurisdiction. The writ of error which is before us was then prosecuted by the Gas Company to the judgment of the district court of appeal refusing to grant the writ of certiorari.

At the threshold a motion to dismiss requires to be considered. It is based upon the ground that the court below had, under the state Constitution and laws, no power to review by certiorari the action of the superior court, and therefore that court was the court of last resort competent to decide the cause. But this disregards the fact that the district court of appeal assumed jurisdiction of the cause, and that the supreme court of the state declined to review its judgment for want of jurisdiction. As whether, under the circumstances, the district court of appeal rightfully assumed jurisdiction by certiorari, is a question of purely state law, which we may not review, the judgment of that court is the judgment of the state [25] court of last resort having power to consider the case, and the motion to dismiss is denied.

Besides the due process and equal protection clauses of the 14th Amendment, the contract clause of the Constitution of the United States is relied upon in the assignments. In argument, however, that contention is based, not upon the impairment by the ordinance of any particular contract right, but upon the unwarranted burden which it is asserted would result from enforcing the ordinance as against the railroad company because of the general authority which it possessed under its franchises to operate its railroad in the streets. But this at once establishes that the consideration of the contract clause is negligible, and hence, that it is only necessary to pass upon the contentions under the due process and equal protection clauses. This results, since, if the police power of the city to provide by the ordinance for the protection of the health and safety of the people was unrestrained by any contract provision, the police power necessarily dominated the right of the company under its franchises to use the streets, and subjected that right to the authority to adopt the ordinances in question.

Further, as the right of the city to adopt such ordinance, so far as the state Constitution and laws are concerned, is concluded by the decision below, and as it is elementary that the due process clause of the 14th Amendment does not restrain the states in the exercise of their legitimate police power, it follows that the case narrows down to a consideration of whether the ordinance in question was generically embraced by the police power of the state, and, if it was, whether the power was so abused as to cause its exertion to exceed the limits of the police power, thus bringing the ordinance under the prohibitions of the due process and equal protection clauses of the 14th Amendment.

That the regulation made by the ordinance was inherently [26] within the police power is, we think, too clear for anything but statement. We cite in the margin, however, decided cases dealing with the subject, in some of which the power here in question, when exerted for the same purpose and to the same extent, was upheld, and in others of which, although the manifestations of the exercise of the power were somewhat different, its existence was accepted as indisputable; and to text-writers who state the same view.[1]

That the power possessed was, on the face of the ordinance, not unreasonably exerted, and therefore that its exercise was not controlled by the due process clause of the 14th Amendment, is, we are also of opinion, equally clear. And this is true likewise of the contention as to the equal protection clause of the Amendment, since that proposition rests upon the obviously unwarranted assumption that no basis for classification resulted from the difference between the operation of the street railway cars moving on tracks in the streets of the city and the movement of a different character of vehicles in such streets.

Affirmed.

[27] POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE COMPANY, Petitioner,
v.
WARREN-GODWIN LUMBER COMPANY.

Commerce — conflicting state and Federal regulations — telegraph companies — limiting liability for unrepeated message.

Congress has so far occupied the entire field of the interstate business of telegraph companies by enacting the provisions of the Act of June 18, 1910, respecting interstate telegraph rates, as to exclude state action invalidating a contract limiting the liability of a telegraph company for error in sending an unrepeated interstate message to the refunding of the price paid for the transmission of the message.

[For other cases, see Commerce, I. c; III. o, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued and submitted November 17, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi to review a judgment which reversed, with a direction to enter judgment for the plaintiff, a judgment of the Circuit Court of Hinds County, in that state, in favor of defendant in a suit against a telegraph company for error in transmitting an unrepeated interstate message. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 116 Miss. 660, 77 So. 601.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ellis B. Cooper argued the cause, and, with Messrs. J. T. Brown and J. N. Flowers, filed a brief for petitioner:

The transmission of messages from one state to another by telegraph is interstate commerce.

Mr. William D. Anderson submitted the cause for respondent:

Until specific action by Congress regulating the liability of telegraph companies to their patrons in respect to interstate commerce, the laws of the states are applicable.

Southern R. Co. v. Reid, 222 U. S. 424, 436, 56 L. ed. 257, 260, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140; Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 57 L. ed. 314, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 257, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148.

By the Act of June 18th, 1910, Congress did not undertake to occupy the entire field of interstate commerce by telegraph, and assume exclusive jurisdiction and authority in the regulation thereof.

Dickerson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 114 Miss. 115, 74 So. 779; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bailey, 108 Tex. 427, 196 S. W. 516; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Boegli, — Ind. —, 115 N. E. 773; Des Arc Oil Mill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 132 Ark. 335, 6 A.L.R. 1081, 201 S. W. 273.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

In Primrose v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 883, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1098, the court passed upon the validity of a contract made by a telegraph company with the sender of a message by which, in case the message was missent, the liability of the company was limited to a refunding of the price paid for sending it, unless, as a means of guarding against mistake, the repeating of the message from the office to which it was directed to the office of origin was secured by the payment of an additional sum. It was held that such a contract was not one exempting the company from [28] liability for its negligence, but was merely a reasonable condition appropriately adjusting the charge for the service rendered to the duty and responsibility exacted for its performance. Such a contract was therefore decided to be valid, and the right to recover for error in transmitting a message which was sent subject to it was accordingly limited.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Showers, 112 Miss. 411, 73 So. 276, the supreme court of that state was called upon to consider the validity of a contract by a telegraph company limiting its responsibility for missending an unrepeated message essentially like the contract which was considered and upheld in the Primrose Case. The court decided that, as the Act of Congress of June 18, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 539, 545, chap. 309, Comp. Stat. § 8563, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1108), had operated to exert the power of Congress over telegraph companies as to their interstate business and contracts, Congress had taken possession of the field and thus excluded state legislation, and hence such a contract was valid and enforceable in accordance with the rule laid down in the Primrose Case. In holding this, however, the court pointed out that, but for the act of Congress, a different rule would apply, as, under the state law, such a contract was invalid because it was a stipulation by a carrier limiting its liability for its negligence.

In Dickerson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 114 Miss. 115, 74 So. 779, the validity of a like contract by a telegraph company for the sending of an unrepeated message once again arose for consideration. In passing upon it the court declared that the ruling previously made in the Showers Case, as to the operation of the Act of Congress of 1910, was erroneous. Coming, therefore, anew to reconsider that subject, it was held that the Act of Congress of 1910 had not extended the power of Congress over the rates of telegraph companies for interstate business and the contracts made by them as to such subject, and hence the [29] Showers Case, in so far as it held to the contrary, was overruled. Thus removing the contract from the operation of the national law and bringing it under the state law, the court held that the contract was void and not susceptible of being enforced, because it was a mere contract exempting the telegraph company from the consequences of its negligence.

The case before us involving the extent of the liability of the Telegraph Company for an unrepeated interstate message governed by a contract like those considered in the previous cases was decided by a state circuit court after the decision in the Showers Case and before the overruling of that case by the Dickerson Case. Presumably, therefore, the court, because of the Showers decision, upheld the validity of the contract and accordingly limited the recovery. The appeal which took the case to the court below, however, was there heard after the decision in the Dickerson Case. In view of that situation the court below, in disposing of the case, expressly declared that the only issue which was open was the correctness of the ruling in the Dickerson Case, limiting the operation and effect of the Act of Congress of June 18, 1910. Disposing of that issue, the ruling in the Dickerson Case was reiterated and the contract, although it concerned the transmission of an interstate message, was declared not affected by the act of Congress and to be solely controlled by the state law, and to be therefore void. That subject presents, then, the only Federal question, and, indeed, the only question in the case.

For the sake of brevity, we do not stop to review the cases which perturbed the mind of the court below in the Dickerson Case as to the correctness of its ruling in the Showers Case (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hughes, 191 U. S. 477, 48 L. ed. 268, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crovo, 220 U. S. 364, 55 L. ed. 498, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 399; Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 57 L. ed. 314, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 234 U. S. 542, 58 L. ed. 1457, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 955, 5 N. C. C. A. 1024), but content [30] ourselves with saying that we are of opinion that the effect which was given to them was a mistaken one. We come at once, therefore, to state briefly the reasons why we conclude that the court below mistakenly limited the Act of Congress of 1910, and why, therefore, its judgment was erroneous.

In the first place, as it is apparent on the face of the Act of 1910 that it was intended to control telegraph companies by the Act to Regulate Commerce, we think it clear that the Act of 1910 was designed to and did subject such companies as to their interstate business to the rule of equality and uniformity of rates which it was manifestly the dominant purpose of the Act to Regulate Commerce to establish,—a purpose which would be wholly destroyed if, as held by the court below, the validity of contracts made by telegraph companies as to their interstate commerce business continued to be subjected to the control of divergent, and it may be, conflicting, local laws.

In the second place, as in terms the act empowered telegraph companies to establish reasonable rates, subject to the control which the Act to Regulate Commerce exerted, it follows that the power thus given, limited, of course, by such control, carried with it the primary authority to provide a rate for unrepeated telegrams and the right to fix a reasonable limitation of responsibility where such rate was charged, since, as pointed out in the Primrose Case, the right to contract on such subject was embraced within the grant of the primary ratemaking power.

In the third place, as the act expressly provided that the telegraph, telephone, or cable messages to which it related may be "classified into day, night, repeated, unrepeated, letter, commercial, press, government and such other classes as are just and reasonable, and different rates may be charged for the different classes of messages," it would seem unmistakably to draw under the Federal [31] control the very power which the construction given below to the act necessarily excluded from such control. Indeed, the conclusive force of this view is made additionally cogent when it is considered that, as pointed out by the Inter-State Commerce Commission (Cultra v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 44 Inters. Com. Rep. 670), from the very inception of the telegraph business, or at least for a period of forty years before 1910, the unrepeated message was one sent under a limited rate and subject to a limited responsibility of the character of the one here in contest.

But we need pursue the subject no further, since, if not technically authoritatively controlled, it is in reason persuasively settled by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in dealing in the case above cited with the very question here under consideration as the result of the power conferred by the Act of Congress of 1910; by the careful opinion of the circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit, dealing with the same subject (Gardner v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 145 C. C. A. 399, 231 Fed. 405); and by the numerous and conclusive opinions of state courts of last resort, which, in considering the Act of 1910 from various points of view, reached the conclusion that that act was an exertion by Congress of its authority to bring under Federal control the interstate business of telegraph companies, and therefore was an occupation of the field by Congress which excluded state action (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bank of Spencer, 53 Okla. 398, 156 Pac. 1175; Haskell Implement & Seed Co. v. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. 114 Me. 277, 96 Atl. 219; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bilisoly, 116 Va. 562, 82 S. E. 91; Bailey v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 97 Kan. 619, 156 Pac. 716; Durre v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 165 Wis. 190, 161 N. W. 755; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Schade, 137 Tenn. 214, 192 S. W. 924; Meadows v. Postal Teleg. & Cable Co. 173 N. C. 240, 91 S. E. 1009; Norris v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 174 N. C. 92, 93 S. E. 465; Bateman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 174 N. C. 97, L.R.A.1918A, 803, 93 S. E. 467; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lee, 174 [32] Ky. 210, 192 S. W. 70, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1026, 15 N. C. C. A. 1; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Foster, 224 Mass. 365, P.U.R.1916F, 176, 113 N. E. 192; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hawkins, 14 Ala. App. 295, 70 So. 12).

It is indeed true that several state courts of last resort have expressed conclusions concerning the act of Congress applied by the court below in this case. But we do not stop to review or refer to them, as we are of opinion that the error in the reasoning upon which they proceed is pointed out by what we have said and by the authorities to which we have just referred.

It follows that the judgment below was erroneous, and it must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

And it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice Pitney dissents.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al., Appts.,
v.
LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION.

Municipal corporations — powers — constructing street lighting system — police power or proprietary capacity.

1. The construction of a municipal electric street lighting system was not done in the city's governmental capacity, —an exertion of police power,—but in its proprietary or quasi private capacity, and therefore the city is subordinate in right to a private corporation which was an earlier and lawful occupant of the field. [For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, II. f, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — police power — due process of law — municipal lighting plant — displacement of private systems — compensation.

2. A municipality may not, consistently with U. S. Const., 14th Amend., as a matter of public right, clear a space for the construction of its own street lighting system by removing or relocating the instrumentalities of a privately owned lighting system occupying the public streets under a franchise legally granted, without com-

Argued October 23, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California to review a decree enjoining the execution of a municipal ordinance providing for a municipal electric street lighting system in such a way as to trespass upon a privately owned lighting system. Affirmed.

See same case below, 241 Fed. 912.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Mathews argued the cause, and, with Mr. Albert Lee Stephens, filed a brief for appellants:

The order of the municipal authorities was in conformity with conditions attached to the company's franchise at its inception, and which are binding on the company.

Knight v. United Land Asso. 142 U. S. 161, 35 L. ed. 974, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258; Curtis, Electricity, § 223; Mitchell v. Dakota Cent. Teleph. Co. 25 S. D. 409, 127 N. W. 582.

The company, besides being bound by contractual conditions attached to its franchise at its inception, is subject to reasonable regulation by the city in the exercise of its police power.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1269; Elliott, Roads & Streets, §§ 939, 1066; Merced Falls Gas & E. Co. v. Turner, 2 Cal. App. 720, 84 Pac. 239.

The regulatory measures complained of are presumed to be reasonable, and the burden is on the company to show the contrary.

People v. Stokes, 281 Ill. 159, 118 N. E. 87; Portland v. Montgomery, 38 Or. 215, 62 Pac. 755; Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. §§ 591, 649; Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 32 L.R.A. 527, 44 Pac. 725.

The company failed to plead or prove facts sufficient to show that the ordinance and order complained of are arbitrary, unreasonable, or confiscatory.

Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 710, 28 L. ed. 1145, 1147, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 257, 258; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Electric Light & P. Co. 178 N. Y. 325, 70 N. E. 866; Louisville Home Teleph. Co. v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 49 C. C. A. 524, 111 Fed. 663; Cumberland Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Louisville Home Teleph. Co. 114 Ky. 892, 72 S. W. 4; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 50 L. ed. 596, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175; Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 32 L.R.A. 527, 44 Pac. 725.

The district court erroneously assumed that the question of public necessity for the establishment of the municipal electric lighting system was for the determination of that court, and that unless the city proved that such necessity existed, the police power could not be availed of to force the company from positions it had taken in the public streets.

Miller v. Fitchburg, 180 Mass. 32, 61 N. E. 277; Revere Water Co. v. Winthrop, 192 Mass. 455, 78 N. E. 497; Platt v. San Francisco, 158 Cal. 74, 110 Pac. 304.

The district court was not justified in holding that the company is protected by the principle that first in time is first in right, against the enforcement of regulatory measures requiring it to change the location of its structures in a public street, in order to make room for a later utility.

Merced Falls Gas & E. Co. v. Turner, 2 Cal. App. 720, 84 Pac. 239; Louisville Home Teleph. Co. v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 49 C. C. A. 524, 111 Fed. 663; Michigan Teleph. Co. v. Charlotte, 93 Fed. 11.

The district court erred in holding that the ordinance and order complained of are unreasonable and arbitrary, on the ground that they have the effect of impairing the obligation of the contract between the company and the state, in violation of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States.

The district court erred in holding that the ordinance and order complained of have the effect of depriving the company of its property and rights without due process of law, in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The district court erred in holding that the ordinance and order complained of have the effect of denying to the company the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 50 L. ed. 596, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175.

The district court erred in holding that the ordinance and order complained of have the effect of taking the company's property without just compensation, and of depriving the company of its property or rights without due process of law, in violation of the 5th Amendment of the United States Constitution.

Hunter v. Pittsburgh, 207 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 151, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; Ohio ex rel. Lloyd v. Dollison, 194 U. S. 445, 48 L. ed. 1062, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703.

The district court erred in holding that the ordinance and order complained of are unreasonable and arbitrary, on the ground that they are, in effect, the taking or damaging of private property for public use without just compensation, in violation of § 14 of article 1 of the Constitution of California.

The district court erred in holding that the ordinance complained of constitutes an unlawful attempt to delegate legislative power to the board of public works of the city.

Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 51 L. ed. 523, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367; Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310; Harbor Comrs. v. Excelsior Redwood Co. 88 Cal. 491, 22 Am. St. Rep. 321, 26 Pac. 375.

Messrs. Albert Lee Stephens, Charles S. Burnell, and W. B. Mathews also filed a brief for appellants:

The proposed enforcement of the ordinance against appellee's utility, so as to secure a place in the street for the municipal utility, being consistent with the reservation in favor of the city, under appellee's franchise, of the right to direct appellee's use of the street, may not properly be considered either a revocation or an impairment of any right or obligation under such franchise.

Merced Falls Gas & E. Co. v. Turner, 2 Cal. App. 720, 84 Pac. 239; Hamilton, G. & C. Traction Co. v. Hamilton & L. Electric Transit Co. 69 Ohio St. 402, 69 N. E. 991.

The distinction attempted to be made by the lower court and by counsel for appellee, between proprietary instrumentalities and governmental interests as objects of the police power, is entirely unfounded.

Mr. Paul Overton argued the cause, and, with Mr. Herbert J. Goudge, filed a brief for appellee:

Appellee's franchise is an irrevocable contract.

Appellee's franchise vested it with an easement or right of way in the streets occupied by its lines of poles and wires, which easement or right of way is property under the protection of the constitutional guaranties.

The ordinance and order of the city involve a taking of appellee's property contrary to the constitutional guaranties.

While it has been repeatedly decided that when Federal jurisdiction is invoked on the ground of the impairment of the obligation of a contract, this court will decide for itself, without reference to the state decisions, the extent of the contract rights claimed to have been impaired (see Russell v. Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant city is a municipal corporation of the state of California, and the other appellants are its officers, having official relation to it and its rights and powers.

The appellee is a California corporation invested with and in exercise of a franchise for generating and selling electricity through a system of poles and wires and other works in the public streets of Los Angeles, among others, in that known as York boulevard.

It, the appellee,—to which we shall refer as the corporation,—brought this suit in the district court to declare invalid and restrain the execution of an ordinance of the city providing for a municipal electric street-lighting system and making way for it in such way, it is charged, that it obstructed, trespassed upon, and made dangerous [34] the system of the corporation, in violation of its rights under the Constitution of the United States.

The district court granted the prayer of the bill upon the grounds relied on, and hence the appeal from its decision direct to this court.

The ordinance attacked is very long by reason of its repetitions. It, however, can be intelligibly reduced to a few provisions. It was passed March 6, 1917, and approved the next day, and declares in its title its purpose to be to provide for the removal and relocation of poles and other property in the public streets of the city "when necessary in order that the municipal electrical street lighting system may be constructed, operated, and maintained." Such system and its installation "as speedily as may be practicable" is declared necessary "for the public peace, health, and safety."

It is recited that certain "fixtures, appliances, and structures" (they are enumerated) are maintained in the streets, and it is necessary "in order that sufficient space may be secured for the said municipal electrical system . . . and that the work of constructing and establishing the same may be carried on, to provide for the removal or relocation of poles and other properties so maintained by such persons and corporations."

It is therefore ordained that (§ 1) whenever it shall appear to the board of public works that the removal or relocation of such "fixtures, appliances, or structures" (there is an enumeration again which we omit as useless repetition) is necessary in order that the municipal system may have place, the board shall give notice to the person, firm, or corporation owning or controlling the property to remove or relocate the same. The notice to designate the property to be removed and the place to which it shall be removed, and it shall be the duty of such person, firm, or corporation to comply with the notice within five days of its receipt. To fail or refuse to so [35] comply or to diligently prosecute the work of removal is made unlawful (§§ 2 and 3), and (§ 4) made a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment in the city jail for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Each day's delay is made a separate offense.

In case of failure to remove or prosecute the work of removal the board of public works is given power to do what the notice directs. (§ 5.)

By § 6 the dependency of the city upon private contracts for lighting the public streets and other public places is declared, some of which contracts, it is said, have expired, and all will have expired by July, 1917, thus making the completion of the municipal system necessary to provide for lighting the streets without interruption and the removal or relocation of the appliances owned or controlled by various persons, firms, or corporations immediately necessary in order that the city may complete and install its system. And it is declared that the "ordinance is urgently required for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety."

The ordinance was preceded by acts of interference by the city with the property of the corporation in other streets and also in York boulevard, which interference was enjoined by interlocutory and final decree by the superior court of Los Angeles county in a suit brought by the corporation,—the city not defending. And it was interference, not displacement, and the court's decree was adapted to the extent of the interference. The decree as to other streets than York boulevard was as follows: ". . . from in any manner trespassing upon, interfering with, moving, or displacing the poles or wires, or either or any of them, owned or controlled wholly or in part by plaintiff [the corporation in this case]; or erecting or placing any pole, cross arm, or other electrical appliance or equipment, or attaching any wire or cable to or upon [36] any pole, cross arm, or other electrical appliance or equipment in a fixed position within the distance from any pole, cross arm, wire, or other electrical appliances or equipment owned or controlled wholly or in part by plaintiff [the corporation in this case], as prescribed by the laws of the state of California and the rules and regulations of the Railroad Commission of said state; . . ." As to York boulevard the decree was as follows: ". . . from conveying, running, or transmitting electric power or energy through the lines and wires heretofore erected and constructed by said city of Los Angeles, its agents, servants, and employees," until the wires, poles, and equipment of the city are removed to the distance "prescribed by the laws of the state of California and the rules and regulations of the Railroad Commission thereof."

The decree contained a provision upon which the city bases a contention, or rather a suggestion, to which we shall presently refer. The provision is as follows: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting or restraining the city of Los Angeles or its proper boards, officers, or agents from carrying into effect any ordinance of said city providing for the removal or relocation of poles, anchors, cross arms, wires, street lamps, or other fixtures, appliances, or structures owned or controlled by said plaintiff [the corporation in this case], and located in, upon, over, or under any public street or other public place of said city."

The ground or basis of the ordinance of March 6, 1917, here involved, is the same as that of the interference in the suit in the state court; that is, the right to displace the corporation's property in order that the municipal system may be operated or erected. There is no attempt here, as there was no attempt in that suit, at absolute displacement. The order of the board of public works, issued in accordance with the direction of the ordinance, required the corporation to change or shift or lower its wires to [37] the detriment of their efficient use, as it is contended. There is some conflict as to the extent and effect, which, however, we are not called upon to reconcile. It was stipulated "that the value of the right to exercise the franchises of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation in the public streets and thoroughfares of the city of Los Angeles exceeded the sum of $3,000 and was in excess of $4,000." And it was testified that if the city, in constructing its system, proceeds as it has done in ordering the removal of poles and wires, it will cost the corporation between $50,000 and $60,000; but, passing by the particular instance of interference, and considering the ordinance's broad assertion of right, the contention of the city and the corporation are in sharp contradiction.

We say "the ordinance's broad assertion of right" to distinguish the narrower right of the city to erect a system of its own. Of the latter right there is no question. The district court conceded it, indeed, praised the project, but decided that it could not be exercised to displace other systems, without compensation, occupying the streets by virtue of franchises legally granted. Thus the only question is whether the city may, as matter of public right and without compensation, clear a "space" for the instrumentalities of its system by removing or relocating the instrumentalities of other systems. The city asserts the affirmative,—asserts the right to displace other systems as an exercise of the police power, and, further, as an incident of its legislative power. It is further asserted that these powers are attributes of government, and that their exercise, when not palpably arbitrary, is not subject to judicial interference. And that "every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and all doubts resolved in a way to uphold the lawmaking power [in this case the city]; and a contrary conclusion will never be reached upon light consideration." Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 32 L.R.A. 527, 44 Pac. 725.

[38] In counter propositions the corporation urges its franchise and the right it conveys to occupy the streets of the city,—rights, it is said, having the inviolability of a contract and the sanctity of private property; not, indeed, free from reasonable regulation, if such regulation is governmental, but free from molestation or displacement to make "space" for a city system, for that is proprietary. We have, therefore, the not unusual case of rights asserted against governmental power,—a case somewhat fruitful of disputable considerations and upon which judgment may not be easy or free from controversy. But there is some point where power or rights must prevail, however plausible or specious the argument of either against the other may be. As, for example, in the present case. The city has undoubtedly the function of police; it undoubtedly has the power of municipal lighting and the installation of its instrumentalities (Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U. S. 195, 202, 58 L. ed. 912, 920, L.R.A.1918E, 882, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1282); but function and power may be exceeded, and, so far as wrongful, be restrained. And such was the conclusion of the district court, applying the Constitution of the United States, and such the ground of its judgment.

In what way the public peace or health or safety was imperiled by the lighting system of the corporation, or relieved by its removal or change, the court was unable to see, and it is certainly not apparent. The court pointed out that there were several lighting systems in existence and occupying the streets, and that there was no contest, or disorder, or overcharge of rates, or peril or defect of any kind; and therefore concluded that the conditions demonstrated that while the city might install its own system, there was no real "public necessity" arising from consideration of public health, peace, or safety requiring the city to engage in the business of furnishing light.

The court reasoned and concluded that what the city did was done not in its governmental capacity,—an exertion of the police power,—but in its "proprietary or quasi [39] private capacity;" and that therefore the city was subordinate in right to the corporation, the latter being an earlier and lawful occupant of the field. The difference in the capacities is recognized, and the difference in attendant powers pointed out, in decisions of this court. Vilas v. Manila, 220 U. S. 345, 55 L. ed. 491, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416; Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U. S. 195, 58 L. ed. 912, L.R.A.1918E, 882, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1282; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, 50 L. ed. 261, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, 4 Ann. Cas. 737; New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U. S. 453, 49 L. ed. 831, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471; Vicksburg v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. 206 U. S. 496, 508, 51 L. ed. 1155, 1160, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 762.

The city's contentions are based on a confusion of these capacities and the powers or rights respectively attributed to them, and upon a misunderstanding of the reservations in the decree of the state court. The reservations were made only in prudence, not to define the existence or extent of powers, and forestall their challenge, but to leave both to the occasion when either of them might be asserted or denied. And it is clear that it was not intended to confound the capacities in which the city might act, and the relation of the city's acts to those capacities.

It is not necessary to repeat the reasoning or the examples of the cases cited above, by which and in which the different capacities of the city are defined and illustrated. A franchise conveys rights, and if their exercise could be prevented or destroyed by a simple declaration of a municipal council, they would be infirm indeed in tenure and substance. It is to be remembered that they come into existence by compact, having, therefore, its sanction, urged by reciprocal benefits, and are attended and can only be exercised by expenditure of money, making them a matter of investments and property, and entitled as such against being taken without the proper process of law,—the payment of compensation.

The franchise of the present controversy was granted prior to 1911, and hence has the attributes and rights described in Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U. S. 195, 58 L. ed. 912, L.R.A.1918E, 882, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1282. Its source, as was that of the franchise in that case, is the Constitution of [40] the state, and is that "of using the public streets and thoroughfares thereof . . . for introducing into and supplying" a city "and its inhabitants either with gaslight or other illuminating light." We said of such that the "breadth of the offer was commensurate with the requirements of the undertaking which was invited. The service to which the provision referred was a community service. It was the supply of a municipality—which had no municipal works—with water or light." And again: "The individual or corporation undertaking to supply the city with water or light was put in the same position as though such individual or corporation had received a special grant of the described street rights in the city which was to be served." We can add nothing to this definition of rights, and, we may repeat, they did not become immediately violable or become subsequently violable.

It will be observed that we are not concerned with the duty of the corporation operating a public utility to yield uncompensated obedience to a police measure adopted for the protection of the public, but with a proposed uncompensated taking or disturbance of what belongs to one lighting system in order to make way for another. And this the 14th Amendment forbids. What the grant was at its inception it remained, and was not subject to be displaced by some other system, even that of the city, without compensation to the corporation for the rights appropriated.

We think, therefore, that the decree of the District Court protecting the corporation's rights from disturbance under the ordinance in question must be and it is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Pitney and Mr. Justice Clarke dissent.

[41] ROBERT P. ERVIEN, Commissioner of Public Lands of the State of New Mexico, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Public lands — New Mexico land grant — use of proceeds — breach of trust.

The specific enumeration in the New Mexico Enabling Act of June 20, 1910, of the purposes for which the public lands therein granted to that state may be disposed of, and the further provision that the natural products and money proceeds of such lands shall be subject to the same trusts as the lands themselves, renders invalid state legislation authorizing the commissioner of public lands of that state to expend annually not to exceed 3 cents on the dollar from the annual income of his office from sales and leases of the public lands for making known the resources and advantages of the state generally, and particularly to home seekers and investors, and such a threatened breach of trust will be enjoined at the instance of the United States.

[45] Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit to enjoin the expenditure by appellant, commissioner of public lands of the state of New Mexico, of any of the funds derived from the sale and lease of lands granted and confirmed to the state by the act admitting her into the Union. The right to sell or lease is asserted under a certain act of New Mexico entitled, "An Act Concerning the Publicity and Promotion of Public Resources and Welfare."

The Enabling Act was passed June 20, 1910 [36 Stat. at L. 557, chap. 310], and on August 21, 1911 [37 Stat. at L. 39], by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, New Mexico and Arizona were admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original states.

By the Enabling Act certain grants of public lands were made to New Mexico for purposes of which there was a specific enumeration.

It is provided by § 10 of the act that the lands granted and transferred thereby "shall be by the said state held in trust, to be disposed of in whole or in part only in manner as herein provided and for the several objects specified in the respective granting and confirmatory provisions, and that the natural products and money proceeds of any of said lands shall be subject to the same trusts as the lands producing the same."

And it is further provided that the "disposition of any of said lands, or of any money or thing of value directly or indirectly derived therefrom, for any object other than that for which such particular lands, or the lands from which such money or thing of value shall have been derived, were granted or confirmed, or in any manner contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed a breach of trust."

It is made the duty of the Attorney General of the [46] United States to prosecute in the name of the United States such proceedings at law or in equity as may be necessary to enforce the provisions of the act "relative to the application and disposition of the said lands and the products thereof and the funds derived therefrom."

The Constitutional Convention was required to provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the state, that the state and its people consent to the provisions of the act, and the Constitution of the state did so provide.

The legislature of the state, on March 8, 1915, passed, over the governor's veto, an act entitled as we have designated, the first section of which is as follows:

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for the commissioner of public lands to expend for making known the resources and advantages of this state generally and particularly to home seekers and investors, more than 3 cents on the dollar of the annual income of his office from sales and leases of lands, but, up to such limit of money annually, he may give or cause to be given publicity to such resources and advantages, and do or cause to be done all incidental work, in his judgment advisable to be done."

The commissioner receives from sales and leases of the lands granted a large income annually, the income for the year ending December 31, 1914, being approximately $741,000, and he threatens to expend 3 cents on the dollar of the annual income derived from sales and leases to give publicity to the resources and advantages of the state generally in conformity with the act of the legislature of March 8, 1915, and, unless restrained, will do so.

The answer, though in form a denial of some of the averments of the bill and an admission of others, is really an objection to its sufficiency to authorize the relief prayed, and the ground of objection is that the bill, taken as a whole,

"is no more than an attempt to interfere with the due administration of a trust estate by the trustee, the [47] state of New Mexico, which requires the payment of necessary and proper expenses out of the income or proceeds of the trust property, the grantor of the trust, the government of the United States, having made no other provision for the payment of such necessary and proper costs and expenses; and defendant avers that the expenditure of a small portion of such income and proceeds for the purpose of advertising the resources of the state and the value of its lands, with the hope of thereby increasing the demand for the purchase and leasing of such lands and in the enhancing of the prospective prices to be derived therefrom, is a proper and necessary expense of the administration of said trust estate."

A temporary injunction was applied for and denied, and subsequently the case by stipulation was submitted upon bill and answer, upon which it was ordered that the bill be and it was dismissed.

The decree was reversed by the circuit court of appeals, and the case remanded with direction to enter a decree for the United States. This appeal was then prosecuted.

The case is not in broad range and does not demand much discussion. There is in the Enabling Act a specific enumeration of the purposes for which the lands were granted, and the enumeration is necessarily exclusive of any other purpose. And to make assurance doubly sure it was provided that the natural products and money proceeds of such lands should be subject to the same trusts as the lands producing the same. To preclude any license of construction or liberties of inference it was declared that the disposition of any of the lands or of the money or anything of value directly or indirectly derived therefrom for any object other than the enumerated ones should "be deemed a breach of trust."

The dedication, we repeat, was special and exact, precluding any supplementary or aiding sense, in prophetic realization, it may be, that the state might be tempted [48] to do that which it has done, lured from patient methods to speculative advertising in the hope of a speedy prosperity.

It must be admitted there was enticement to it and a prospect of realization, and such was the view of the district court. The court was of opinion that a private proprietor of the lands would, without hesitation, use their revenues to advertise their advantage, and that that which was a wise administration of the property in him could not reach the odious dereliction of a breach of trust in the state.

The phrase, however, means no more in the present case than that the United States, being the grantor of the lands, could impose conditions upon their use, and have the right to exact the performance of the conditions. We need not extend the argument or multiply considerations. The careful opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals has made it unnecessary. We approve, therefore, its conclusion and affirm its decree.

Affirmed.

LIVERPOOL, BRAZIL, & RIVER PLATE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, Petitioner,

v.

BROOKLYN EASTERN DISTRICT TERMINAL.

Shipping — limiting liability — interest in adventure.

The value of a car float and a disabled tug lashed to either side of another tug which was actually responsible for a collision cannot, although they were all owned by the same person, be included, when limiting liability, conformably to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4283-4285, which provide that the liability of the owner of any vessel for any injury by collision shall in no case exceed the value of the interest of such owner in such vessel.

[For other cases, see Shipping, V. c, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 14, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the Southern District of New York for the limitation of liability of a vessel owner. Affirmed.

See same case below, 162 C. C. A. 664, 250 Fed. 1021.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.—On limitation of shipowner's liability—see note to Lawton v. Comer, 7 L.R.A. 55.

Mr. Van Vechten Veeder argued the cause, and, with Mr. Charles C. Burlingham, filed a brief for petitioner:

Where two vessels without motive power are lashed alongside and in tow of a steam tug, the three vessels forming a flotilla owned in common, engaged in the same adventure, and operated by the servants of the owner, the owner is entitled to limit his liability for negligent navigation only upon surrendering the whole flotilla.

The Main v. Williams, 152 U. S. 122, 131, 38 L. ed. 381, 384, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486; Thompson Towing & Wrecking Asso. v. McGregor, 124 C. C. A. 479, 207 Fed. 209; The Columbia, 19 C. C. A. 436, 44 U. Hammond Lumber Co. 134 C. C. A. 575, 218 Fed. 161; The Bordentown, 40 Fed. 682; The Anthracite, 162 Fed. 388.

There may be no liability whatever in rem, and yet the shipowner may be entitled to limit his liability by surrendering the vessel which was concerned in the disaster.

The limitation statute, being in derogation of the common-law rights of the claimant, is to be construed strictly against the shipowner.

The Main v. Williams, 152 U. S. 122, 38 L. ed. 381, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486.

Mr. Samuel Park argued the cause, and, with Mr. Henry E. Mattison, filed a brief for respondent:

A tug and her tow cannot be regarded as one vessel for the purpose of ascertaining their relations between themselves, or their several liabilities to respond for the consequences of a fault of one of them.

S. 42, 22 Week. Rep. 927.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel in admiralty brought by the petitioner against the respondent for a collision with the petitioner's steamship Vauban while it was moored at a pier in Brooklyn. The respondent does not deny liability, but claims the right to limit it under Rev. Stat. §§ 4283–4285, Comp. Stat. §§ 8021–8023, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 336, 360, 363, to the value of the vessel that caused the damage. The moving cause was the respondent's steam tug Intrepid, which was proceeding up the East river, with a car float loaded with railroad cars lashed to its port side and on its starboard side a disabled tug, both belonging to the [52] respondent. By a stipulation dated August 3, 1917, it was agreed that the damage sustained was $28,036.98, with $5,539.84 interest. The value of the tug Intrepid was found to be $5,750, and the liability of the respondent was limited by the district court to that sum, with interest. The circuit court of appeals affirmed the decree without an opinion. 162 C. C. A. 664, 250 Fed. 1021. The case is brought here on the question whether the value of the whole flotilla should not have been included in the decree.

The car float was the vessel that came into contact with the Vauban, but as it was a passive instrument in the hands of the Intrepid, that fact does not affect the question of responsibility. Cushing v. The John Fraser (The James Gray v. The John Fraser) 21 How. 184, 15 L. ed. 106; The J. P. Donaldson, 167 U. S. 599, 603, 604, 42 L. ed. 292, 294, 295, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 951; The Eugene F. Moran, 212 U. S. 466, 474, 475, 53 L. ed. 600, 603, 604, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 339; Union S. S. Co. v. The Aracan, L. R. 6 P. C. 127, 43 L. J. Prob. N. S. 30, 31 L. T. N. S. 42, 22 Week. Rep. 927, 2 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 350. The rule is not changed by the ownership of the vessels. The John G. Stevens, 170 U. S. 113, 123, 42 L. ed. 969, 973, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544; The W. G. Mason, 74 C. C. A. 83, 142 Fed. 913, 917; 212 U. S. 466, 475; L. R. 6 P. C. 127, 133. These cases show that for the purposes of liability the passive instrument of the harm does not become one with the actively responsible vessel by being attached to it. If this were a proceeding in rem it may be assumed that the car float and disabled tug would escape, and none the less that they were lashed to the Intrepid, and so were more helplessly under its control than in the ordinary case of a tow.

It is said, however, that when you come to limiting liability, the foregoing authorities are not controlling,—that the object of the statute is "to limit the liability of vessel owners to their interest in the adventure" (The Main v. Williams, 152 U. S. 122, 131, 38 L. ed. 381, 384, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486), and that the same reason that requires the surrender of boats and apparel requires the surrender of the other instrumentalities by means of which the tug was rendering the services for which it [53] was paid. It can make no difference, it is argued, whether the cargo is carried in the hold of the tug or is towed in another vessel. But that is the question, and it is not answered by putting it. The respondent answers the argument with the suggestion that, if sound, it applies a different rule in actions in personam from that which, as we have said, governs suits in rem. Without dwelling upon that, we are of opinion that the statute does not warrant the distinction for which the petitioner contends.

The statute follows the lead of European countries, as stated in The Main v. Williams, 152 U. S. 122, 126, 127, 38 L. ed. 381–383, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486. Whatever may be the doubts as to the original grounds for limiting liability to the ship, or with regard to the historic starting point for holding the ship responsible as a moving cause (The Blackheath (United States v. Evans) 195 U. S. 361, 366, 367, 49 L. ed. 236, 237, 238, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46), it seems a permissible conjecture that both principles, if not rooted in the same conscious thought, at least were influenced by the same semiconscious attitude of mind. When the continental law came to be followed by Congress, no doubt, alongside of the desire to give our shipowners a chance to compete with those of Europe, there was in some sense an intent to limit liability to the venture; but such a statement gives little help in deciding where the line of limitation should be drawn. No one, we presume, would contend that other unattached vessels, belonging, if you like, to the same owner, and co-operating to the same result with the one in fault, would have to be surrendered. Thompson Towing & Wrecking Asso. v. McGregor, 124 C. C. A. 479, 207 Fed. 209, 212–214; The Sunbeam, 115 C. C. A. 370, 195 Fed. 468, 470; The W. G. Mason, 74 C. C. A. 83, 142 Fed. 913, 919. The notion, as applicable to a collision case, seems to us to be that if you surrender the offending vessel you are free, just as it was said by a judge in the time of Edward III.: "If my dog kills your sheep and I, freshly after the fact, tender you the dog, you are without recourse against me." Fitzh. Abr. Barre, 290. The words of the [54] statute are: "The liability of the owner of any vessel for any injury by collision shall in no case exceed the value of the interest of such owner in such vessel." The literal meaning of the sentence is reinforced by the words "in no case." For clearly the liability would be made to exceed the interest of the owner "in such vessel" if you said frankly, "In some cases we propose to count other vessels in although they are not 'such vessel;'" and it comes to the same thing when you profess a formal compliance with the words, but reach the result by artificially construing "such vessel" to include other vessels if only they are tied to it. Earlier cases in the second circuit had disposed of the question there, and those in other circuits for the most part, if not wholly, are reconcilable with them. We are of opinion that the decision was right. The Transfer No. 21, 160 C. C. A. 469, 248 Fed. 459; The W. G. Mason, 74 C. C. A. 83, 142 Fed. 913; The Erie Lighter 108, 250 Fed. 490, 497, 498; Van Eyken v. Erie R. Co. 117 Fed. 712, 717.

Submitted on motion to dismiss or affirm November 17, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of Oklahoma County, in that state, in favor of plaintiff in an action for death. Affirmed.

See same case below, — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 570.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. J. Roberts submitted the cause for plaintiff in error. Messrs. C. O. Blake and John E. DuMars were on the brief:

The common-law defense of contributory negligence was not taken away or changed by the provision of article 23, § 6, of the Oklahoma Constitution.

McKennon v. Winn, 1 Okla. 334, 22 L.R.A. 501, 33 Pac. 582; Severy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 6 Okla. 153, 50 Pac. 162, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 463; Pittman v. El Reno, 4 Okla. 638, 46 Pac. 495; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Long, 41 Okla. 190, 137 Pac. 1156, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 432; Hailey-Ola Coal Co. v. Morgan, 39 Okla. 71, 134 Pac. 29; Frederick Cotton Oil & Mfg. Co. v. Traver, 36 Okla. 717, 129 Pac. 747; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Duran, 38 Okla. 719, 134 Pac. 876; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Loftis, 25 Okla. 496, 106 Pac. 824; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Shepherd, 20 Okla. 629, 95 Pac. 243; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Pitchford, 44 Okla. 197, 143 Pac. 1146; Chickasha Cotton Oil Co. v. Brown, 39 Okla. 245, 134 Pac. 850.

There is no inherent difference between negligence of plaintiff and negligence of defendant,—both are contributory; and the Oklahoma supreme court has frequently and expressly recognized the rule that whether or not an act is negligent is a question of law only, except where the minds of reasonable men might differ with reference thereto.

Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Shepherd, 20 Okla. 629, 95 Pac. 243; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Loftis, 25 Okla. 496, 106 Pac. 824; Muskogee Vitrified Brick Co. v. Napier, 34 Okla. 618, 126 Pac. 792; Midland Valley R. Co. v. Bailey, 34 Okla. 193, 124 Pac. 987; Smith v. Acme Mill. Co. 34 Okla. 439, 126 Pac. 190; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Hess, 34 Okla. 615, 126 Pac. 760.

These decisions of the Oklahoma supreme court were in accordance with the established rule.

1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. §§ 52, 56.

The right to the defense of contributory negligence, and to such defenses as bar recovery, became a substantial, vested right, protected by the Federal Constitution, at the time of the occurrence upon which the action was brought.

Bank v. East Grand Forks, 94 Minn. 246, 102 N. W. 703.

The guaranty of due process and the equal protection of law assures a continuance of a government of impartial laws, and the existence of judicial tribunals to construe and apply them; and the 14th Amendment having had in view principles, conditions, and meanings in jurisprudence as known at the time of the adoption, evasion by attempts at violation of those meanings is forbidden.

McGehee, Due Process of Law, 59; Den ex dem. Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 18 How. 272, 15 L. ed. 372; Huber v. Guggenheim, 89 Fed. 601; Thayer, Ev. pp. 191–193; Lowe v. Kansas, 163 U. The constitutional convention unquestionably had the power to vary the common law and to reject the rules making assumption of risk and contributory negligence defenses, but it has not done so.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Long, 41 Okla. 190, 137 Pac. 1156, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 432.

The guaranty of the equal protection of the laws and due process of law forbids the investment of arbitrary powers of determination and use of variant standards for the test of negligence. Judicial power is jurisdiction, and there can be no judgment without jurisdiction, and a judical determination, or confession, or admission; and juries have no judicial powers under the Constitution and laws of Oklahoma, and there has been no pretense of conferring such powers as to this question.

Messrs. W. A. Ledbetter and H. L. Stuart submitted the cause for defendants in error. Messrs. R. R. Bell and E. P. Ledbetter were on the brief:

A state may abolish contributory negligence as a defense.

If a state can abolish contributory negligence as a defense, it certainly has the power to declare that the defense of contributory negligence shall be one of fact, to be determined by the jury.

Bowersock v. Smith, 243 U. S. 29, 35, 61 L. ed. 572, 577, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 371; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67–78, 59 L. ed. 1204–1211, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 678; New York C. R. Co. v. Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the defendant in error for knocking down and killing her intestate, Roberts. He stepped upon the railroad track when a train was approaching in full view, and was killed. It may be assumed, as the state court assumed, that, if the question were open for a ruling of law, it would be ruled that the plaintiff could not recover. But the Oklahoma Constitution provides that "the defense of contributory negligence or of assumption of risk shall, in all cases whatsoever, be a question of fact, and shall, at all times, be left to the jury." Art. 23, § 6. The case was left to the jury, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment was entered for her and was affirmed on error by the supreme court of the state, which held that the provision applied to the case, and that, when so applied, it did not contravene the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The state Constitution was in force when the death occurred, and therefore the defendant had only such right to the defense of contributory negligence as that Constitution allowed. The argument that the railroad company had a vested right to that defense is disposed of by the decisions that it may be taken away altogether. Arizona Employers' Liability Cases (Arizona Copper Co. v. Hammer), 250 U. S. 400, 63 L. ed. 1058, 6 A.L.R. 1537, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553; Bowersock v. Smith, 243 U. S. 29, 34, 61 L. ed. 572, 577, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 371. It is said that legislation cannot [56] change the standard of conduct, which is matter of law in its nature, into matter of fact, and this may be conceded; but the material element in the constitutional enactment is not that it called contributory negligence fact, but that it left it wholly to the jury. There is nothing, however, in the Constitution of the United States or its Amendments, that requires a state to maintain the line with which we are familiar between the functions of the jury and those of the court. It may do away with the jury altogether (Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. ed. 678), modify its constitution (Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 44 L. ed. 597, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 448, 494), the requirements of a verdict (Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U. S. 211, 60 L. ed. 961, L.R.A.1917A, 86, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 595, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 505), or the procedure before it (Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 111, 53 L. ed. 97, 111, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 14; Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309, 340, 59 L. ed. 969, 985, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582). As it may confer legislative and judicial powers upon a commission not known to the common law (Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. S. 210, 53 L. ed. 150, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67), it may confer larger powers upon a jury than those that generally prevail. Provisions making the jury judges of the law as well as of the facts in proceedings for libel are common to England and some of the states, and the controversy with regard to their powers in matters of law more generally as illustrated in Sparf v. United States, 156 U. S. 51, 39 L. ed. 343, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 168, and Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 Dall. 1, 4, 1 L. ed. 483, 484, shows that the notion is not a novelty. In the present instance the plaintiff in error cannot complain that its chance to prevail upon a certain ground is diminished, when the ground might have been altogether removed.

Judgment affirmed.

Argued October 13, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia to review a decree which, by refusing an appeal, in effect affirmed a decree of the Circuit Court of Lunenburg County, in that state, refusing to enjoin an alleged trespass. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George E. Allen argued the cause, and, with Mr. John Garland Pollard, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The Virginia statutes are violative of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, because they authorize the taking by public officials of private property for public use, without due process of law.

Rep. 361; Tait v. Central Lunatic Asylum, 84 Va. 271, 4 S. E. 697.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court:

By this suit the owner of land adjoining a public road in Virginia seeks an injunction against the taking of earth from his land to be used in repairing the road. The taking is from the most convenient and nearest place, where it will be attended by the least expense, and has the express sanction of a statute of the state. Pollard's Code 1904, § 944a, clauses 21 and 22.[1] Whether the statute denies to the owner the due process of law guaranteed by the 14th Amendment is the Federal question in the case. It was duly presented in the state court, and, while no opinion was delivered, the record makes it plain that, by the judgment rendered, the court resolved the question in favor of the validity of the statute.

It is conceded that the taking is under the direction of public officers and is for a public use; also that adequate provision is made for the payment of such compensation as may be awarded. Hence no discussion of these matters is required. The objection urged against the statute is that it makes no provision for affording the owner an opportunity to be heard respecting the necessity or expediency of the taking or the compensation to be paid.

Where the intended use is public, the necessity and expediency of the taking may be determined by such agency and in such mode as the state may designate. They are legislative questions, no matter who may be charged with their decision, and a hearing thereon is not essential to due process in the sense of the 14th Amendment. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 406, 25 L. ed. 206, 207; A. [59] Backus, Jr., & Sons v. Fort Street Union Depot Co. 169 U. S. 557, 568, 42 L. ed. 853, 858, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 445; Adirondack R. Co. v. New York, 176 U. S. 335, 349, 44 L. ed. 492, 499, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 460; Sears v. Akron, 246 U. S. 242, 251, 62 L. ed. 688, 698, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 245.

But it is essential to due process that the mode of determining the compensation be such as to afford the owner an opportunity to be heard. Among several admissible modes is that of causing the amount to be assessed by viewers, subject to an appeal to a court, carrying with it a right to have the matter determined upon a full trial. United States v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 519, 27 L. ed. 1015, 1017, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346; A. Backus, Jr., & Sons v. Fort Street Union Depot Co. 169 U. S. 569, 42 L. ed. 859, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 445. And where this mode is adopted due process does not require that a hearing before the viewers be afforded, but is satisfied by the full hearing that may be obtained by exercising the right to appeal. Lent v. Tillson, 140 U. S. 316, 326, et seq., 35 L. ed. 419, 424, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 825; Winona & St. P. Land Co. v. Minnesota, 159 U. S. 526, 537, 40 L. ed. 247, 251, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 83; Wells, F. & Co. v. Nevada, 248 U. S. 165, 168, 63 L. ed. 190, 192, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62. And see Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 18–30, 45, 43 L. ed. 873, 879–883, 889, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580.

With these principles in mind we turn to the statute in question. By clause 21 it authorizes certain officers engaged in repairing public roads to take earth for that purpose from adjacent lands, and by clause 22 it declares:

"If the owner or tenant of any such land shall think himself injured thereby, and the superintendent of roads, or his deputy, can agree with such owner as to the amount of damage, they shall report the same to the board of supervisors, or, if they cannot agree, a justice, upon application to him, shall issue a warrant to three freeholders, requiring them to view the said land, and ascertain what is a just compensation to such owner or tenant for the damage to him by reason of anything done under the preceding section. The said freeholders, after being sworn according to the provisions of § 3 of this act,[2] [60] shall accordingly ascertain such compensation and report the same to the board of supervisors. Said board may allow the full amount so agreed upon, or reported by said freeholders, or so much thereof as upon investigation they may deem reasonable, subject to such owner or tenant's right of appeal to the circuit court as in other cases."

The same statute, in clause 5, deals with the compensation to be paid for lands taken for roadways, and in that connection provides that the proprietor or tenant, if dissatisfied with the amount allowed by the supervisors, "may of right appeal to the circuit court of said county, and the said court shall hear the matter de novo" and determine and certify the amount to be paid. And a general statute (§ 838), which regulates the time and mode of taking appeals from decisions of the supervisors disallowing claims in whole or in part, provides that the claimant, if present when the decision is made, may appeal to the circuit court within thirty days thereafter, and, if not present, shall be notified in writing by the clerk, and may appeal within thirty days after service of the notice.

[1] Other enactments of March 12, 1912, chap. 151, March 21, 1914, chap. 174, and March 17, 1916, chap. 279, make the statute specially applicable here, but they require no particular attention.

[2] ". . . that they will faithfully and impartially discharge their duty as viewers."

Apart from what is implied by the decision under review, no construction of these statutory provisions by the state court of last resort has been brought to our attention; so, for the purposes of this case, we must construe them. The task is not difficult. The words employed are direct and free from ambiguity, and the several provisions are in entire harmony. They show that, in the absence of an agreement, the compensation is to be assessed primarily by viewers; that their award is to be examined by the supervisors and approved or changed as to the latter may appear reasonable; and that, from the decision of the supervisors, an appeal lies as of right to the circuit court, where the matter may be heard de novo. Thus, by exercising the right to appeal, the owner may obtain a full hearing in a court of justice,—one concededly possessing and exercising a general jurisdiction. An opportunity to have such a [61] hearing, before the compensation is finally determined, and when the right thereto can be effectively asserted and protected, satisfies the demand of due process.

Under the statute the proceedings looking to an assessment may be initiated by the owner as well as by the road officers. Either may apply to a justice for the appointment of viewers. Thus the owner is free to act promptly and upon his own motion, if he chooses.

But it is contended that where the road officers take the initiative,—as they do in many instances,—the proceedings may be carried from inception to conclusion without any notice to the owner, and therefore without his having an opportunity to take an appeal. We think the contention is not tenable. It takes into account some of the statutory provisions and rejects others equally important. It is true there is no express provision for notice at the inception or during the early stages of the proceedings; and for present purposes it may be assumed that such a requirement is not even implied, although a different view might be admissible. See Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750. But the provisions relating to the later stage—the decision by the supervisors—are not silent in respect of notice, but speak in terms easily understood. Clauses 5 and 22, taken together, provide that the owner, if dissatisfied with the decision, shall have the right to appeal as in other cases. This presupposes that he will have some knowledge of the decision; and yet neither clause states how the knowledge is to be obtained, or when or how the right of appeal is to be exercised. All this is explained, however, when § 838 is examined. It deals with these questions in a comprehensive way and evidently is intended to be of general application. Of course, newly created rights of appeal of the same class fall within its operation unless the legislature provides otherwise. Here the legislature has not provided otherwise, and so has indicated that it is content to have the general statute applied. As before stated, that [62] statute provides that the claimant, if not present when the supervisors' decision is made, shall be notified thereof in writing, and shall have thirty days after such notice within which to appeal. If he be present when the decision is made, he is regarded as receiving notice at that time, and the thirty days for taking an appeal begin to run at once. It is apparent, therefore, that special care is taken to afford him ample opportunity to appeal, and thereby to obtain a full hearing in the circuit court.

The claim is made that this opportunity comes after the taking, and therefore is too late. But it is settled by the decisions of this court that where adequate provision is made for the certain payment of the compensation without unreasonable delay, the taking does not contravene due process of law in the sense of the 14th Amendment merely because it precedes the ascertainment of what compensation is just. Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U. S. 380, 402, 407, 40 L. ed. 188, 197, 198, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43; A. Backus, Jr., & Sons v. Fort Street Union Depot Co. 169 U. S. 557, 568, 42 L. ed. 853, 858, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 445; Williams v. Parker, 188 U. S. 491, 47 L. ed. 559, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 440; Crozier v. Fried. Krupp Aktiengesellschaft, 224 U. S. 290, 306, 56 L. ed. 771, 776, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488. And see Branson v. Gee, 25 Or. 462, 24 L.R.A. 355, 36 Pac. 527. As before indicated, it is not questioned that such adequate provision for payment is made in this instance.

We conclude that the objections urged against the validity of the statute are not well taken.

Judgment affirmed.

DICKSEY WILLIAMS and Lucy Williams.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 63–67.)

Constitutional law — due process of law — rate regulation — penalties.

1. The imposition of severe penalties as a means of enforcing railway passenger rates prescribed by statute is not a denial of due process of law in a case in which it does not appear that the carrier was not afforded an adequate opportunity for safely testing the validity of the rate, or that its deviation therefrom proceeded from any belief that the rate was invalid.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — rate regulation — penalties.

2. So far as due process of law is concerned, the penalty imposed by a state statute upon a railway company which exacts more than the prescribed passenger fares may be given to the aggrieved passenger, to be enforced by private suit, and such penalty need not be confined or apportioned to his loss or damage.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — rate regulation — penalties.

3. The penalties prescribed by a statute giving to a passenger aggrieved by a carrier's exaction of a fare in excess of the prescribed rate the right to recover in a civil suit not less than $50 nor more than $300 and costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee, cannot be said to be so severe and oppressive as to be wholly disproportionate to the offense or obviously unreasonable, and hence to amount to a denial of due process of law.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 11, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court of Clark County, in that state, in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to recover penalties for overcharge by a carrier in the transportation of passengers. Affirmed.

See same case below, 131 Ark. 442, 199 S. W. 376.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert E. Wiley argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Edward J. White and Edgar B. Kinsworthy, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

This statute takes the carrier's property without due process of law, and denies to it the equal protection of the laws, contrary to the 14th Amendment, because the penalty is arbitrary and unreasonable, and not in proportion to the actual damages sustained.

The penalty is relatively exorbitant when considered in connection with its purpose.

Wadley Southern R. Co. v. Georgia, 235 U. S. 651, 59 L. ed. 405, P.U.R.1915A, 106, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Waldrop, 93 Ark. 42, 123 S. W. 778; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Ark. 221, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 348, 29 S. W. 752; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 54 Ark. 101, 11 L.R.A. 452, 15 S. W. 18.

The statute is violative of the 14th Amendment because the penalties provided by it are so severe as to deprive the carrier of the right to resort to the courts to test its validity.

Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Tucker, 230 U. S. 340, 57 L. ed. 1507, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961.

No brief was filed for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court:

By a statute of Arkansas, regulating rates for the transportation of passengers between points within the state, [64] any railroad company that demands or collects a greater compensation than the statute prescribes is subjected "for every such offense" to a penalty of "not less than $50 nor more than $300 and costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee," and the aggrieved passenger is given a right to recover the same

in a civil action. Act April 4, 1887, Laws 1887, p. 227; Kirby's Dig. 1904, § 6620; Act March 4, 1915, Laws 1915, p. 365; Kirby & C. Dig. 1916, § 8094.

In June, 1915, a company operating a line of railroad within the state demanded and collected 66 cents more than the prescribed fare from each of two sisters carried over part of its line when returning to their home from a school commencement elsewhere in the state; and in suits separately brought for the purpose, and afterwards consolidated, these passengers obtained judgments against the company for the overcharge, a penalty of $75 and costs of suit, including an attorney's fee of $25. The company appealed, asserting that the provision for the penalty was repugnant to the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment; but the supreme court of the state sustained the provision and affirmed the judgments. 131 Ark. 442, 199 S. W. 376. To obtain a review of that decision the company prosecutes this writ of error.

The grounds upon which the provision is said to contravene due process of law are, first, that the penalty is "so severe as to deprive the carrier of the right to resort to the courts to test the validity" of the rate prescribed, and, second, that the penalty is "arbitrary and unreasonable, and not proportionate to the actual damages sustained."

It is true that the imposition of severe penalties as a means of enforcing a rate, such as was prescribed in this instance, is in contravention of due process of law, where no adequate opportunity is afforded the carrier for safely testing, in an appropriate judicial proceeding, the validity [65] of the rate—that is, whether it is confiscatory or otherwise—before any liability for the penalties attaches. The reasons why this is so are set forth fully and plainly in several recent decisions and need not be repeated now. Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 147, 52 L. ed. 714, 723, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764; Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19, 53, 53 L. ed. 382, 400, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 217 U. S. 196, 207, 208, 54 L. ed. 727, 731, 732, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461, 18 Ann. Cas. 989; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Tucker, 230 U. S. 340, 57 L. ed. 1507, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Wadley Southern R. Co. v. Georgia, 235 U. S. 651, 659, et seq., 59 L. ed. 405, 410, P.U.R.1915A, 106, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214.

And it also is true that where such an opportunity is afforded and the rate is adjudged valid, or the carrier fails to avail itself of the opportunity, it then is admissible, so far as due process of law is concerned, for the state to enforce adherence to the rate by imposing substantial penalties for deviations from it. Wadley Southern R. Co. v. Georgia, supra, pp. 667 et seq.; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Texas, 246 U. S. 58, 62, 62 L. ed. 574, 578, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236.

Here it does not appear that the carrier had not been afforded an adequate opportunity for safely testing the validity of the rate, or that its deviation therefrom proceeded from any belief that the rate was invalid. On the contrary, it is practically conceded—and we judicially know—that if the carrier really regarded the rate as confiscatory, the way was open to secure a determination of that question by a suit in equity against the Railroad Commission of the state, during the pendency of which the operation of the penalty provision could have been suspended by injunction. Wadley Southern R. Co. v. Georgia, supra. See also Allen v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 230 U. S. 553, 57 L. ed. 1625, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030; Rowland v. Boyle, 244 U. S. 106, 61 L. ed. 1022, P.U.R. 1917C, 685, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McKnight, 244 U. S. 368, 61 L. ed. 1200, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611. And the record shows that at the trial the carrier not only did not raise any question about the correct fare, but proposed and secured an instruction to the jury wherein the prescribed rate was recognized as controlling.

[66] It therefore is plain that the first branch of the company's contention cannot prevail.

The second branch is more strongly urged, and we now turn to it. The provision assailed is essentially penal, because primarily intended to punish the carrier for taking more than the prescribed rate. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 54 Ark. 101, 106, 11 L.R.A. 452, 15 S. W. 18; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Waldrop, 93 Ark. 42, 45, 123 S. W. 778. True, the penalty goes to the aggrieved passenger, and not the state, and is to be enforced by a private, and not a public, suit. But this is not contrary to due process of law; for, as is said in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 523, 29 L. ed. 463, 466, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, "the power of the state to impose fines and penalties for a violation of its statutory requirements is coeval with government; and the mode in which they shall be enforced, whether at the suit of a private party, or at the suit of the public, and what disposition shall be made of the amounts collected, are merely matters of legislative discretion." Nor does giving the penalty to the aggrieved passenger require that it be confined or proportioned to his loss or damages; for, as it is imposed as a punishment for the violation of a public law, the legislature may adjust its amount to the public wrong rather than the private injury, just as if it were going to the state. See Marvin v. Trout, 199 U. S. 212, 225, 50 L. ed. 157, 162, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 31.

The ultimate question is whether a penalty of not less than $50 and not more than $300 for the offense in question can be said to bring the provision prescribing it into conflict with the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment.

That this clause places a limitation upon the power of the states to prescribe penalties for violations of their laws has been fully recognized, but always with the express or tacit qualification that the states still possess a wide latitude of discretion in the matter, and that their enactments transcend the limitation only where the penalty [67] prescribed is so severe and oppressive as to be wholly disproportioned to the offense and obviously unreasonable. Coffey v. Harlan County, 204 U. S. 659, 662, 51 L. ed. 666, 668, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305; Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U. S. 73, 78, 52 L. ed. 108, 110, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 212 U. S. 86, 111, 53 L. ed. 417, 430, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 220; Collins v. Johnston, 237 U. S. 502, 510, 59 L. ed. 1071, 1079, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649.

Of this penalty and the need for it the supreme court of the state says: "It is commonly known that carriers are not prone to adhere uniformly to rates lawfully prescribed, and it is necessary that deviation from such rates be discouraged and prohibited by adequate liabilities and penalties; and we regard the penalties prescribed as no more than reasonable and adequate to accomplish the purpose of the law and remedy the evil intended to be reached." Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Davis, 114 Ark. 519, 525, 170 S. W. 245.

When the penalty is contrasted with the overcharge possible in any instance it, of course, seems large; but, as we have said, its validity is not to be tested in that way. When it is considered with due regard for the interests of the public, the numberless opportunities for committing the offense, and the need for securing uniform adherence to established passenger rates, we think it properly cannot be said to be so severe and oppressive as to be wholly disproportioned to the offense or obviously unreasonable.

Judgment affirmed.

[68] CORSICANA NATIONAL BANK OF CORSICANA, Plff. in Err.,
v.
SAMUEL WISTAR JOHNSON.

National banks — liability of director — excessive loan — knowing participation or assent.

1. Directors of a national bank cannot be held liable, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, for knowingly participating in or assenting to an excessive loan unless such participation or assent was not through mere negligence, but was knowing and in effect intentional. If, however, a director deliberately refrains from investigating that which it is his duty to investigate, any violation of the statute must be regarded as in effect intentional.

Trial — province of court and jury — weight of evidence.

2. What weight should be given to substantial evidence tending to support the plaintiff's view of disputed facts is for the jury, not the court, to determine.

[For other cases, see Trial, VI. a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Liability of national bank directors for excessive loan to one borrower.

The present discussion has been confined to the liability of directors for violation of the statutory duty, and does not consider the liability for a violation of the common-law duty.

Pleading — sufficiency of allegations — action against national bank director.

3. An allegation in the amended petition in an action against a director of a national bank for knowingly participating, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, in an excessive loan, that the transaction set forth was a loan of that character, whether regarded as one loan to two persons designated as a "firm," as the plaintiff alleges the fact to be, or regarded as two loans, as contended for by the defendant in his pleadings theretofore filed, is sufficient if the proof tends to show a single and excessive loan made to such persons jointly in any capacity, or made in form one half to each, but in substance as a single loan.

[For other cases, see Pleading, II. j, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Evidence — weight — denial.

4. The denial by a director of a national bank, in an action against him for knowingly participating, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, in an excessive loan, that such loan was a single one, or that he knew it to be such, is not conclusive where there is substantial evidence inconsistent with such denial, tending to show facts and circumstances attendant upon the transaction of which he had knowledge, and subsequent conduct in the nature

---

That there is a common-law obligation resting upon national bank directors in addition to the duty imposed by statute is settled by the United States Supreme Court in the recent case of Bowerman v. Hamner, 250 U. S. 504, 63 L. ed. 1113, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 549, in which the court, after referring to Yates v. Jones Nat. Bank, 206 U. S. 158, 51 L. ed. 1002, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638, and Jones Nat. Bank v. Yates, 240 U. S. 542, 60 L. ed. 788, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 429, cases dealing with the liability of bank directors for making false reports of the financial condition of the bank, says: "While the cited cases hold that in a suit for damages against national bank directors based solely upon a violation of duty imposed by the National Bank Act, it is not enough to show a negligent violation of the act, but that something more in effect than intentional violation must be shown to justify a recovery, and that this is the exclusive rule for measuring the responsibility of directors as to such violations, yet it is expressly pointed out in the opinion of the court that the act does not relieve such directors from the common-law duty to be honest and diligent, as is shown by the oaths which they are required to take to 'diligently and honestly administer the affairs of the association' as well as not to 'knowingly violate or willingly permit to be violated any of the provisions of this title,'—the National Bank Act. The rule thus announced would perhaps be applicable if the bill were limited to the charge of liability based solely upon the statutory prohibition of excessive loans, for it is reasonably clear that Bowerman did not have actual knowledge of the making of the loans or of anything else connected with the conduct of the bank. He deliberately avoided acquiring knowledge of its affairs, and wholly abdicated the duty of supervision and control which rested upon him as a director. The National Bank Act imposes various specific duties on directors other than those imposed by the common law, and it is obviously possible that a director may neglect one or more of the former and not any of the latter, or vice versa. For example, in this case we have the gross negligence of the appellant in failing to discharge his common-law duty to diligently administer the affairs of the bank made the basis for the contention that he did not 'knowingly' violate his statutory duty by permitting the excessive loans to be made. While the statute furnishes the exclusive rule for determining whether its provisions have been violated or not, this does not prevent the application of the common-law rule for measuring violations of common-law duties. And there is no sound reason why a bill may not be so framed that if the evidence fails to establish statutory negligence, but establishes common-law negligence, a decree may be entered accordingly, and thus the necessity for a resort to a second suit avoided."

The contrary statement in Zinn v. Baxter, 65 Ohio St. 341, 62 N. E. 327, an action brought in the state court against directors for making excessive loans, to the effect that the rights of the bank and of its stockholders, as well as the liability of its officers and directors, were fixed and imposed by the National Bank Act alone, and that the statutes of Ohio, the common law, and rules of equity as to such rights and liabilities, had no application, so far as it denies the existence of a common-law duty resting upon directors, is no longer correct.

The National Bank Act, after prescribing the limit of loans to individuals, makes the directors who have "knowingly" participated in a loan in excess of the limit liable in their personal and individual capacity for all damages sustained in consequence of the excess loan. In accord with the plain provisions of this act, it is held that a director who of admissions by him, also inconsistent with such denial.

[For other cases, see Evidence, XII. m, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

National banks — powers — limitations on loan.

5. The limitation in U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5200, upon the total liabilities to a national bank of any single borrower, will not be construed as including his liability as surety or indorser for money borrowed by another, in view of the long-continued practice and administrative rulings of the Comptroller of the Currency not to include such liabilities in the computation.

[For other cases, see Banks, IV. g, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

National banks — liability of director — excessive loans — standing of borrower.

6. The question whether a director of a national bank knowingly participated in or assented to, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5239, the making of a loan in excess of the limit prescribed by § 5200, is not to be confused by any consideration of the supposed personal or financial standing of the borrower.

National banks — liability of director — excessive loan — defenses.

7. The absence of any improper motive participated in or assented to a loan in excess of the limit fixed is personally liable for damages suffered thereby. Witters v. Sowles (1887) 31 Fed. 1, s. c. on subsequent appeal, 43 Fed. 405. In fact, it is made a condition of liability that the director has participated in or consented to the loan. A director who does not knowingly participate in excessive loans is not liable. First Nat. Bank v. Noyes, 168 C. C. A. 543, 257 Fed. 593.

Speaking generally of the liability of directors in a national banking association under the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5239, Comp. Stat. § 9831, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 873, the court, in Grandprey v. Bennett, — S. D. —, 172 N. W. 514, an action in which the plaintiff counted upon false and incorrect reports, the court states that "directors of national banks are liable for violations of the provisions of the Federal statute only when such violations are committed with knowledge on the part of the violators that they are violating such provisions; but that there is 'in effect' an intentional violation of such provisions whenever a director deliberately refuses to examine that which it is his duty to examine, or deliberately refuses to do any act which, under such provisions, it is his duty to perform."

It has been held that there must be actual knowledge, participation, or assent. A director is not constructively chargeable with the knowledge of the cashier, to whom the business of the bank has been intrusted by the directors, who have acted with proper caution. Clews v. Bardon, 36 Fed. 617.

The Federal courts differ as to the liability of a director to suit under the provisions of the National Bank Act before it has been adjudged that acts have been committed which justify the forfeiture of the charter. It has been held that an adjudication that acts have been committed such as justify a forfeiture of the charter is necessary before suit can be brought. Welles v. Graves, 41 Fed. 459. The opinion in this case was by Judge Shiras, and the conclusion reached therein was approved by him in the subsequent case of Gerner v. Thompson, 74 Fed. 125, an action against directors for having published false reports of the condition of the bank.

And this rule was adhered to in Hayden v. Thompson, 67 Fed. 273, a bill in equity by the receiver of a national bank against the stockholders and directors to recover dividends paid without sufficient earnings, the court stating that, so far as the directors were concerned, their liability could only be enforced by the receiver, acting under the direction of the Comptroller, after the violation of the statute had been judicially determined by a court of the United States, and a forfeiture declared.

But the majority view is to the contrary,—that a forfeiture is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action against the directors. Stephens v. Overstolz, 43 Fed. 771; National Bank v. Wade, 84 Fed. 10; Cockrill v. Cooper, 29 C. C. A. 529, 57 U. S. App. 576, 86 Fed. 7. This is the implied holding of Zimn v. Baxter, 65 Ohio St. 341, 62 N. E. 327.

In Stephens v. Overstolz, supra, it appeared as a fact that the charter of the bank had been forfeited, but in the view of the court this is immaterial. The court states that "according to our view of § 5239, Comp. Stat. § 9831, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 873, two results, in no respect dependent upon each other, may follow the making of an excessive loan; that is to say, the Comptroller may, if he thinks proper, proceed to have the charter revoked, alleging the excessive loan as a violation of law; but whether he does so or not, a director of the bank who knowingly participates in or assents to the loan may be compelled to make good whatever damage results to the bank from making the same. This or desire for personal profit on defendant's part is no defense to an action against a director of a national bank for violating U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, by knowingly participating in or assenting to an excessive loan.

National banks — liability of director — excessive loan — joint or several liability.

8. Every director of a national bank knowingly participating in or assenting to a loan in excess of the limit prescribed by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5200, is made liable by § 5239, in his personal and individual capacity, without regard to the question whether other directors likewise are liable; and he may alone be sued.

[For other cases, see Banks, IV. e, 3; Joint Creditors and Debtors, I. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

National banks — liability of director — excessive loan — insolvency of bank — change of stock interest.

9. A national bank may recover from a director the damages sustained by reason of his knowing participation in or assent to an excessive loan, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, although it remained solvent or even prosperous, and irrespective of any changes in stockholding interest or control occurring between the time the cause of action arose and the time of the commencement of the suit or of the trial, and even if the new stockholders acquired their interests with knowledge of the fact that a loss had been sustained, and that such director was responsible for it.

[For other cases, see Banks, IV. e, 3; Estoppel, III. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

seems to us to be the obvious meaning of the law."

A difference of opinion exists as to the tribunal in which the liability must be enforced. According to Welles v. Graves, 41 Fed. 459,—a case involving a complicated state of facts,—the liability can be enforced only in equity. The court in Cockrill v. Cooper, 29 C. C. A. 529, 57 U. S. App. 576, 86 Fed. 7, assumed that the question is whether equity has jurisdiction at all of such an action. It is held that the suit may be brought in equity. That such a suit may be brought in equity is held also in Emerson v. Gaither, 103 Md. 564, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 738, 64 Atl. 26, 7 Ann. Cas. 1114.

In National Bank v. Wade, 84 Fed. 10, it is held that even though the statute does create a liability enforceable by an action at law, "nevertheless it does not diminish the jurisdiction of the courts in equity unless the conditions are such that the remedy at law is equally adequate and complete. In this case the transactions involved are complicated by the subsequent exchanging of promissory notes and taking of property as security for the loans which are alleged to have caused the losses complained of. These securities must be converted into money or otherwise disposed of before the amount of the loss can be definitely ascertained. It is obvious, therefore, that the complainant is entitled to relief in equity because the remedy at law is not adequate or complete."

According to Stephens v. Overstolz, 43 Fed. 771, it may be enforced in an action at law.

In Corsicana Nat. Bank v. Johnson, 134 C. C. A. 510, 218 Fed. 822, apparently a former trial of the principal case, it is held that an action by the bank to hold an officer liable for damages sustained by the bank in consequence of the defendant knowingly violating the provision of the statute limiting loans is a suit to recover damages, and such a suit may be maintained at law, and is not cognizable by a court of equity, in the absence of any showing of the inadequacy of the legal remedy which is available.

It has been held that in such an action at law the issues that should be submitted to the jury are: (1) Whether the loans made to the borrower were made at a time when he was already indebted to the bank in a sum equal to one tenth of its capital actually paid in; (2) whether such loans were knowingly made or assented to by the director or officers sought to be held liable; and (3) what portion of the money so loaned was lost. City Nat. Bank v. Crow, 27 Okla. 107, 111 Pac. 210, Ann. Cas. 1912B. 647.

A director to whom a loan has been made in excess of the limit fixed by the National Bank Act becomes liable as a debtor to the bank, but is not liable as participating in or assenting to the loan on behalf of the bank. Witters v. Sowles, 31 Fed. 1.

It has been held that a bank director cannot be held liable for inducing the bank to extend credit to an individual beyond the statutory limit, where he was not, at the time, acting as director, but as agent for the borrower. Hicks v. Steel, 142 Mich. 292, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 279, 105 N. W. 767.

Limitation of actions — action to enforce liability of bank director — excessive loans.

10. The two years' limitation of Vernon's Sayles's Tex. Civ. Stat. 1914, art. 5687, is not applicable to a cause of action against a national bank director for knowingly participating in or assenting to an excessive loan, but such suit is governed by the four years' limitation prescribed by art. 5690 for actions for which no limitation is otherwise prescribed.

[For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, III. f, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Action — time of — suit against national bank director — excessive loan.

11. A cause of action against a national bank director for knowingly participating in an excessive loan, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, accrues when the bank, through his act, parts with the money loaned, receiving in return negotiable paper that it cannot lawfully accept because the transaction is prohibited. The damage, as well as the injury, is complete at that time, and the bank is not obliged to await the maturity of the paper before suing.

[For other cases, see Action or Suit, I. b; Banks, IV. e, 3, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Damages — liability of national bank director — excessive loans.

12. The entire sum loaned, plus interest and less salvage, should be treated as the damages sustained by a national bank through a director's knowing participation in or assent to an excessive loan, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, and not merely the excess above what lawfully might have been loaned, where the entire excess loan formed but a single transaction.

[For other cases, see Damages, VI. h, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Corporations — powers — corporations operating jointly.

13. A national bank and a loan company organized under state law must, notwithstanding identity of stock ownership and close affiliation in management, be regarded for some purposes as separate corporations; for instance, as being capable in law of contracting with each other.

[For other cases, see Corporations, VI. i, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Corporations — officers — common directors — identity of stock ownership.

14. In considering the practical effect of intercorporate dealings, especially as bearing upon the duties of common directors and the authority of stockholders to control them, identity of stock ownership ought not to be overlooked.

[For other cases, see Corporations, V. d, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

National banks — liability of director — excessive loans — transfer of borrower's indebtedness.

15. The damages sustained by a national bank by reason of a director's knowing participation in or assent to an excessive loan, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, are satisfied by a transfer of the borrower's notes and indebtedness to another corporation for their full face value if, and only if, the transfer is good and valid as against such corporation and its stockholders, or is duly ratified by them.

National banks — liability of director — excessive loan — transfer of borrower's indebtedness — rescission.

16. A national bank director cannot escape liability, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, for knowingly participating in or assenting to an excessive loan because of a sale of the borrower's notes and indebtedness for their full face value to a loan company having the same directors and managers as the bank, and identity of stock ownership, if the transfer was made under circumstances rendering it voidable as against the loan company and as against the stockholders of both corporations, and the stockholders of the loan company exercised their right to rescind without unreasonable delay and gave notice to the bank, and the bank, recognizing the justness of the claim, restored to the loan company what was accepted as the equivalent in value of that which the bank had received for the transfer, the director not having changed his position and not being prejudiced by such delay as there was in exercising the right to rescind.

Corporations — dummy directors — power to rescind fraudulent transfer.

17. A transfer between two corporations having identity of stock ownership and directorates, which transfer was fraudulent as to the transferee corporation, could be annulled by a dummy board of directors chosen by, and acting for, the controlling stockholders for this very purpose, though such a change in personnel was unnecessary, as similar action by boards having identical membership would have had the same effect, if done by the express authority of the stockholders.

[For other cases, see Corporations, V. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

National banks — liability of director — excessive loan — transfer of borrower's indebtedness — rescission.

18. The rescission for fraud of a sale by a national bank of the notes and indebtedness of a borrower for their full face value to a loan company having the same directors and managers as the bank, and identity of stock interest, may not be challenged by a director in the bank in an action against him for having participated in, or assented to, an excessive loan to such borrower, contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, merely because such rescission may have been had in order to permit the bank to bring the action.

National banks — liability of directors — excessive loan — transfer of borrower's indebtedness — rescission — restitution.

19. The question whether a loan company having the same directors and managers as a national bank and identity of stock interest, upon rescinding for fraud a sale to it by the bank of the notes and indebtedness of a borrower for their full face value, received full restitution from the bank, is not material as bearing either upon the bank's right, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5200 and 5239, to sue a director for having knowingly participated in, or assented to, an excessive loan to such borrower, or upon the question of damages.

Argued and submitted January 16, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court for the Northern District of Texas, directing a verdict in favor of defendant in a suit by a bank against a director for having knowingly participated in or assented to an excessive loan. Reversed and remanded to the District Court for further proceedings.

See same case below, 150 C. C. A. 665, 237 Fed. 1016.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph Manson McCormick argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Francis Marion Etheridge and Richard Mays, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The liability of one who appears to be a joint maker on the face of a note given for money borrowed from a national banking association, but who in fact is a surety, must be included in totaling his liability to the bank, to which § 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, Comp. Stat. § 9761, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 761, applies.

The liability of defendant attached when the excessive loan was made, and not first when the notes were taken over by the bank from the loan company. This liability could only be extinguished by the bank receiving in some legal, unavoidable form the principal and interest of the notes in money or value, or by estoppel.

Messrs. Cullen F. Thomas, W. J. McKie, and Henry C. Coke submitted the cause for defendant in error:

The liability of a surety on a note given to a national bank for money borrowed by the principal from the bank is not to be included in determining the surety's liabilities to the bank under

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5200, Comp. Stat. § 9761, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 761.

Pratt's Dig. of National Banks, 1914, Rev. ed. p. 120.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought under § 5239, U. S. Rev. Stat., Comp. Stat. § 9831, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 873, in the then circuit, now district, court of the United States for the northern district of Texas, by plaintiff in error, a national banking association which we may call for convenience the Bank, against defendant in error, formerly a member of its board of directors and its vice president, to hold him liable personally for damages sustained by the Bank in consequence of his having knowingly violated, as was alleged, the provisions of § 5200, Rev. Stat., as amended June 22, 1906 (chap. 3516, 34 Stat. at L. 451, Comp. Stat. § 9761, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 761), by participating as such director and vice president in a loan of the Bank's funds to an amount exceeding one tenth of its paid-in capital and surplus.

The action appears to have been commenced in February, 1910, and, after delays not necessary to be recounted, was tried before the district court with a jury. A verdict was directed in favor of defendant, and the judgment thereon was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, no opinion being delivered in either court. The judgment of affirmance is now under review.

The amended § 5200, Rev. Stat., as it stood at the time the alleged cause of action arose, reads as follows, the matter inserted by the amendment being indicated by brackets:

"Sec. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including, in the liabilities of a company [71] or firm, the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in [and unimpaired and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, that the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed thirty per centum of the capital stock of the association]. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same, shall not be considered as money borrowed."

The pertinent portion of the other section reads as follows:

"Sec. 5239. If the directors of any national banking association shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the association to violate any of the provisions of this title, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association shall be thereby forfeited. . . . And in cases of such violation, every director who participated in or assented to the same shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for all damages which the association, its shareholders, or any other person, shall have sustained in consequence of such violation."

Under the rule settled by familiar decisions of this court, in order for the Bank to prevail in this action it must appear not only that the liabilities of a person, company, firm, etc., to the Bank for money borrowed, were permitted to exceed the prescribed limit, but that defendant, while a director, participated in or assented to the excessive loan or loans not through mere negligence, but knowingly and in effect intentionally (Yates v. Jones Nat. Bank, 206 U. S. 158, 180, 51 L. ed. 1002, 1015, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638), with this qualification: that if he deliberately refrained from investigating that which it was his duty to investigate, any resulting violation of the statute must be regarded as "in effect intentional" [72] (Thomas v. Taylor, 224 U. S. 73, 82, 56 L. ed. 673, 678, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403; Jones Nat. Bank v. Yates, 240 U. S. 541, 555, 60 L. ed. 788, 799, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 429).

The facts are involved, and need to be fully stated. And necessarily, in order to test the propriety of the peremptory instruction given by the trial judge, we must bring into view the facts and the reasonable inferences which tended to a different conclusion, and, where the evidence was in substantial dispute, must adopt a view of it favorable to plaintiff; but of course we do this without intending to intimate what view the jury ought to have taken, had the case been submitted to it.

On June 10, 1907, plaintiff, whose banking house was at Corsicana, Texas, had $100,000 capital and $100,000 surplus, aggregating $200,000, and making $20,000 the applicable limit under § 5200. Defendant was a director and vice president of the Bank, active—perhaps dominant—in the conduct of its banking business, and familiar with the state of its finances.

The averment of a breach of duty relates to an alleged excessive loan or loans made on or about the date last mentioned to Fred Fleming and D. A. Templeton, who, for a considerable time, had been engaged in business as private bankers in Corsicana and in several other towns in Texas under the firm name of Fleming & Templeton, and also had conducted at Corsicana a branch bank for the Western Bank & Trust Company, a state institution of which Fleming was president and Templeton vice president, and whose main banking house appears to have been at Dallas, about 50 miles from Corsicana. There was evidence that, early in June, 1907, Fleming & Templeton terminated their private banking business at Corsicana and turned over their deposit accounts—between $30,000 and $40,000—to the Corsicana National Bank, plaintiff herein, together with money or exchange on the Western Bank & Trust Company sufficient to meet them. Whether the firm was in fact dissolved at that time or later, and [73] whether the dissolution applied to their other branches, or to the Corsicana business only, were points concerning which, under the evidence, there was some doubt.

On or about June 10th, while the president of the Bank was absent on vacation, defendant loaned for the Bank to Fleming and Templeton $30,000 (less discount) upon two promissory notes for $15,000 each, maturing in six months. Defendant testified that both Fleming and Templeton negotiated with him, asking for two separate loans of $15,000 each, telling him that they had dissolved partnership and were winding up and closing out at Corsicana, and would turn over between $30,000 and $40,000 of deposits to the Corsicana National Bank. He further testified: "One of the considerations of this loan was the transfer of the deposits and with it the accounts of Fleming & Templeton." He insisted that two separate loans were made, of $15,000 each, one to Fleming, for which Templeton was surety, the other to Templeton, for which Fleming was surety. But defendant's own account of the circumstances under which and the special inducement upon which the loan was made, with other evidence to be recited below, left room for a reasonable inference that there was in fact but a single loan, and that separate notes were taken in order to avoid the appearance of a loan in excess of the limit. They were in the usual form of joint and several notes, payable to plaintiff's order. One was signed "Fred Fleming, D: A. Templeton," the other, "D. A. Templeton, Fred Fleming," without naming either maker as surety. Discount to the amount of $900 was deducted, and the net proceeds, $29,100, were paid by a draft drawn by the Bank on the Western Bank & Trust Company to the order of "Fleming & Templeton," which was sent by mail, inclosed in a letter written upon the Bank's letterhead, dated June 10, 1907, and addressed to Templeton at Dallas, in which letter, after acknowledging receipt of the two notes for $15,000 each, "signed by [74] yourself and Fred Fleming," it was stated: "We have deducted the discount, $900, and hand you herewith our draft #A, 7830, on Western Bank & Trust Company, order Fleming & Templeton, for $29,100." The retained copy of this letter appears to have been introduced in evidence; at the foot, opposite the place of signature, are the initials "V. P." With regard to this, as also to certain other "V. P." letters dated in the following December and relating to renewal of the notes, defendant testified: "I think I signed the letters which are offered in evidence as exhibits H," etc.

There was evidence that the draft for $29,100 was indorsed in the firm name by Templeton and deposited in the Western Bank & Trust Company at Dallas to the credit of the joint account of Fleming & Templeton, to make up in part an overdraft amounting to more than $125,000; this account having been overdrawn constantly, and in large but varying amounts, since the preceding April.

As a result of an examination of the Bank, made a few days later, the Comptroller of the Currency wrote to its president under date June 22, severely criticizing the Fleming-Templeton loan, among others, as excessive under § 5200, Rev. Stat., Comp. Stat. § 9761, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 761, and saying: "Immediate arrangements must be made to reduce these loans to the legal limit." It was a fair inference that defendant knew of this letter, or, in the proper performance of his duties, would have known of it. Whether any reply was made to it did not appear.

Notwithstanding the warning thus given, when the notes matured in December they were renewed with defendant's assent for a further period of six months, joint notes being given to the Bank as before, and the further sum of $900 being paid by Fleming & Templeton to the Bank for interest in this way: plaintiff, under defendant's direction, charged the amount in a single [75] item to the Western Bank & Trust Company, for account of the borrowers, and the latter institution acknowledged the charge, gave credit to plaintiff for the amount, and charged it against the joint account of Fleming & Templeton. During December some correspondence passed between defendant at Corsicana, he writing as vice president of the Bank, and Templeton at Dallas, relating to the renewal of the notes, tending to show that they were regarded by both writers as representing a single obligation of "Fleming & Templeton." Thus, Templeton on December 3d wrote to defendant: "Referring to the notes of Fleming & Templeton," etc.; and defendant wrote to him on the following day mentioning "renewal notes of loan to you and Mr. Fleming."

The evidence tended to show that up to the time of the renewal the borrowers were apparently solvent, but that about January 15, 1908, they became manifestly and notoriously insolvent. The Western Bank & Trust Company closed its doors on that date and went into liquidation, with Fleming & Templeton owing it several hundred thousand dollars. About the same time Fleming and perhaps Templeton went into bankruptcy, and Templeton afterwards died, and their respective estates paid small dividends upon their obligations. The jury would have been warranted in finding that it was evident to defendant, as a banker, on and after the 15th of January, that there would be a substantial loss upon the Fleming and Templeton notes.

On February 6, 1908, an official bank examiner visited the Bank, with the result that on the 26th the Deputy Comptroller wrote, calling the attention of its officers to alleged repeated violations of the National Banking Law in the conduct of its affairs, specifying certain loans in excess of the limit prescribed by § 5200, among them "Fleming & Templeton, $30,000," and stating that "the directors who are responsible for the loans or permitted [76] them to be made should assume liability for any loss that may be sustained thereon, and not throw the burden of such loss on innocent stockholders." On March 11 the directors, including defendant, united in signing a letter to the Comptroller in reply to his criticisms, among other things saying: "Reference to the Fleming & Templeton item of $30,000 we beg to say that this item has been disposed of by the Bank and they now owe us nothing." It was a reasonable inference that defendant intended to admit that it was a single loan and in excess of the limit.

In explanation of the statement that it had been "disposed of by the Bank," the evidence tended to show that on February 12, 1908, nearly a month after the insolvency of Fleming and Templeton had become notorious, and a few days after the bank examiner's visit, defendant and the president of the Bank caused the two notes of December 10 to be transferred "without recourse" to an affiliated corporation known as the Corsicana National Land & Loan Company (they being directors and officers of this corporation also), upon payment of $29,400, the full face value less discount, as consideration; the payment being made by a transfer of credit upon the books of the Bank. Defendant relies upon this as wholly relieving the Bank from loss by reason of the loan, and consequently as releasing him from responsibility to the Bank. But the evidence tended to show further that the loan company in January, 1910, shortly before this suit was brought, rescinded the transaction upon the ground of fraud, and that there was a settlement as between the loan company and the Bank, based upon an acknowledgment by the latter of the former's right to rescind.

A brief account of the relations between these two corporations, and of their dealings respecting the notes in question, becomes material. The loan company was organized in the month of May, 1907, under the laws of the state of Texas, with $50,000 capital stock and with [77] stockholders and directors identical with those of the Bank. The capital of the company was subscribed for and paid out of a special dividend declared by the directors of the Bank for the purpose, and each stockholder had the same proportion of stock in the company as in the Bank. The purpose of the new corporation, as declared in its charter, was the "accumulation and loan of money." Defendant testified: "The purpose of the loan company, a state corporation, was to take such paper as the bank could not handle. It was organized by the stockholders of the bank and paid for out of the earnings of our bank. . . . The loans of the loan company were largely real estate loans. It was to help out the bank in every possible [way]." From the organization of the company in the spring of 1907 until the spring of 1909, defendant was a director and active in the management of the company as well as of the Bank. He testified that the stockholders of the two corporations were identical, and continued to be so during the entire period just mentioned; that "whenever there was a sale of bank stock it carried with it that particular shareholder's stock in the loan company." During the same period the two corporations had the same president, vice president, and directors, while the assistant cashier of the Bank was secretary of the loan company.

So far as appeared, the transfer of the Fleming and Templeton notes to the loan company, and the payment made by the company to the Bank, were never expressly authorized or ratified by the stockholders of either corporation; nor did it appear that the stockholders of the loan company ever authorized its directors to employ its funds in taking bad or doubtful paper off the hands of the Bank at a loss; much less, to relieve the directors of the Bank from responsibility for its losses.

In April or May, 1909, there was a change in the control of the Bank, due to sales of a majority of the stock, followed [78] by a change of officers, defendant retiring as both stockholder and director. The corresponding shares of he stock of the loan company were transferred at the same time, and the new management officered the company as well as the Bank. So far as appeared from the evidence, the transfer of defendant's stock carried with it no agreement that he should not be held responsible to the Bank because of the Fleming and Templeton loan, nor any approval of the transfer of the loan to the loan company.

The Bank and the loan company held annual meetings of stockholders on January 11, 1910, at which, for the first time, so far as appears, the boards of directors were so selected that a majority of one board no longer were directors of the other corporation. This was done by electing, as five out of nine directors of the loan company, individuals holding one share of stock each, recently placed in their names for the purpose of qualifying them. They were not stockholders of the Bank; but, except for them, the stockholders of the two corporations still were the same, and it was a reasonable inference that the two meetings were attended by the same individuals. Minutes of these stockholders' meetings, and of certain meetings of the respective boards of directors, were introduced in evidence and supplemented by other testimony, from all of which the following additional corporate proceedings appeared. The stockholders of the loan company, more than a majority in interest being present, unanimously adopted a resolution reciting the taking of the notes of December 10, 1907, by the Bank from Fleming and Templeton, and that on or about January 15, 1908, the makers became insolvent and the notes worthless and uncollectable; and setting forth that, with knowledge of this fact, certain of the directors and officers of the Bank illegally and wrongfully transferred the notes to the loan company, for which the same officers and directors, [79] being likewise officers and directors of the loan company, illegally and wrongfully transferred to the Bank out of the funds of the loan company the face value of the notes, whereby the Bank had committed a wrong upon the loan company and was liable to it therefor; and by this resolution the directors of the company were authorized to adjust and settle this demand against the Bank, and to tender and return to the Bank the Fleming and Templeton notes and indebtedness with any collateral security held for them. The directors of the loan company thereafter and on the same day passed a resolution to the like effect, and appointed a committee to make demand upon the Bank for return of the money wrongfully transferred to the Bank for the notes, and to adjust and settle this demand; the notes and indebtedness of Fleming and Templeton and any collateral security held therefor being at the same time tendered and ordered to be returned to the bank. This committee appeared before the stockholders' meeting of the Bank and formally presented the demand, whereupon these stockholders authorized their board of directors to act upon the claim made on the Bank by the loan company, and to adjust and settle it if they should conclude that the Bank was liable to the loan company; otherwise to reject it. A few days later a meeting of the new board of directors of the Bank was held, at which a communication from the loan company committee was presented, in substance the same as that previously presented to the Bank stockholders, and the resolution of the Bank stockholders thereon was read; and thereupon the directors authorized the president of the Bank, if he believed the claim of the loan company to be just, to proceed to settle it in such a way as he might deem to be to the best interest of the Bank. Under this authority, the president of the Bank communicated to the loan company committee in substance that the Bank recognized the legality and justness of the claim of the loan company and [80] would pay it provided the company would purchase from the Bank a certain cotton-mill property for the sum of $65,000, accept $30,000 of this in payment of its demand against the Bank, transfer to the Bank the Fleming and Templeton notes and indebtedness, with all collateral securing the same, and execute to the Bank its own promissory note for the remaining $35,000, with the cotton-mill property as security. This was agreed to by the directors of the loan company, and the settlement was carried out accordingly. Shortly after this, the present action was brought.

The "collateral security" above referred to appears to have consisted of certain shares of stock in a corporation known as the Fleming Ranch & Cattle Company, acquired in the winding-up of the bankrupt estate of Fleming. These shares, so far as the evidence showed, were the only thing of value recovered either by the loan company or by the Bank from the estates of the borrowers. After the present suit was commenced, the Fleming Ranch & Cattle Company was liquidated, and in the distribution of its assets the Bank received sums aggregating $9,149.34, which are credited as payments on account of its claim against defendant.

So far as the above-recited facts were in dispute, there was substantial evidence tending to support a view of them favorable to plaintiff's contentions. What weight should be given to it was for the jury, not the court, to determine. Hepburn v. Dubois, 12 Pet. 345, 376, 9 L. ed. 1111, 1123; Lancaster v. Collins, 115 U. S. 222, 225, 29 L. ed. 373, 374, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ohle, 117 U. S. 123, 129, 29 L. ed. 837, 839, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632; Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Ward, 140 U. S. 76, 91, 35 L. ed. 371, 376, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720; Troxell v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 227 U. S. 434, 444, 57 L. ed. 586, 591, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 274.

We proceed to consider, in the order of convenience, the questions raised upon the record.

(1) And first, as to the direction of a verdict in favor of defendant. Plaintiff, in the amended petition upon which [81] the case went to trial, after a circumstantial statement respecting the transaction of June 10, 1907, alleged that the discount of the notes "was an excessive loan, whether regarded as one loan to the firm of Fleming & Templeton, as plaintiff alleges the fact to be, or regarded as two loans, as contended for by the defendant in his pleadings heretofore filed herein." The designation of Fleming & Templeton as a "firm" is but descriptive, and not essential, and the pleading is sufficient if the proof tended to show a single and excessive loan made to them jointly in any capacity, or made in form one-half to each, but in substance as a single loan.

In our opinion, the trial judge clearly erred in holding, as in effect he must have held, that there was no substantial evidence from which the jury might find that there was an excessive loan in the making of which defendant, as a director of the Bank, knowingly participated. That he acted for the Bank in the matter, and that he knew that any loan in excess of $20,000 was prohibited, he admitted. His denial that it was a single loan, or that he knew it to be such, is not conclusive; there being substantial evidence inconsistent with it, tending to show facts and circumstances attendant upon the transaction, of which he had knowledge, and also subsequent conduct in the nature of admissions by him, inconsistent with his testimony upon this point. The account of the negotiations, as given in defendant's own testimony; the fact that he knew that the firm of Fleming & Templeton, even if dissolved, was still in liquidation; that one of the inducements for the loan (or "loans") was the transfer of deposit accounts of equal or greater amount from the firm to the Bank; that Templeton alone (as shown by the exhibits) appears to have corresponded with defendant concerning the notes; that defendant himself, as vice president of the Bank, wrote to Templeton acknowledging receipt of the two notes for $15,000 each, "signed [82] by yourself and Fred Fleming," and having "deducted the discount, $900," inclosed the Bank's draft, "order Fleming & Templeton for $29,100;" that when the notes fell due in December the correspondence concerning their renewal was conducted by defendant with Templeton alone, and they were treated as representing a single loan, and the discount was charged by defendant or under his direction in a single item; that after the borrowers had become notoriously insolvent, in February, 1908, defendant took part in transferring the notes "without recourse" to the affiliated loan company in the manner and under the circumstances above stated; that the transfer was effected a few days after the visit of the bank examiner; that when the Deputy Comptroller wrote to the Bank, classifying "Fleming & Templeton $30,000" as an excessive loan, and demanding that the directors responsible for making it should assume the loss, defendant joined in signing the reply that has been quoted;—all this, to say nothing of other circumstances that might be mentioned, would have warranted the jury in finding, notwithstanding defendant's denial, that in fact the disputed transaction was a single loan of $30,000, less discount, or, to be precise, $29,100, made to Fleming and Templeton jointly; that defendant knew and assented to this at the time; and that the taking of two notes was but a device to conceal the true nature of the transaction.

(2) Irrespective of whether there was but a single loan or were two separate loans, plaintiff in error contends that the liability of a surety must be added to his direct and primary liability in determining his total liabilities for money borrowed, within the meaning of Rev. Stat. § 5200, Comp. Stat. § 9761, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 761, and that in the present case, although the notes should be found to have represented two entirely separate loans, each within the limit, they must be added together in order to determine whether the limit was exceeded. Cochran v. United States, 157 U. S. 286, 295, 296, 39 L. ed. 704, 707, 708, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628, is cited, where it was held [83] that the word "liabilities," as employed in § 5211, Rev. Stat. (Comp. Stat. § 9774, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 790), included contingent liabilities. We do not regard the case as controlling, because the purpose of that section, and the language employed, differ materially from the purpose and the language of the provision we are dealing with. As to whether in § 5200 the words "the total liabilities . . . of any person . . . for money borrowed," etc., require the liability of a surety or of an indorser for money borrowed by another to be added to his direct liability for money borrowed by himself in ascertaining whether the limit is exceeded,—whatever view we might entertain were the matter res nova,—we are advised that by the practice and administrative rulings of the Comptroller of the Currency during a long period, if not from the beginning of national banking, liabilities which are incurred by one person avowedly and in fact as surety or as indorser for money borrowed by another are not included in the computation. We feel constrained to accept this as a practical construction of the section. And we are not prepared to say that in an action against a director who knows and relies upon the fact that a particular obligation is signed by one merely as surety, although not so described, the defendant may not be permitted to show the truth.

(3) In view of certain contentions urged here in behalf of defendant, and perhaps acceded to by the courts below, it should be said that the question whether defendant knowingly participated in or assented to the making of a loan in excess of the limit prescribed by § 5200 is not to be confused by any consideration of the supposed standing of the borrowers, personal or financial. The statutory limit is a special safeguard prescribed by Congress for the very purpose (among others) of preventing undue reliance upon the financial standing of borrowers. Nor would the absence of any improper motive or a desire for personal profit on defendant's part be a defense; nor the fact that [84] in spite of a loss upon this transaction the Bank remained solvent or even prosperous. Neither is the question of defendant's liability, or the extent of it, to be affected by the fact, if it be a fact, that other officers or directors of the Bank were in part responsible, yet defendant alone was sued; nor that the Bank refrained from suing him until after a change in the stockholding interest or control. Again, in the absence of some special agreement,—and none such appears,—it is immaterial whether the new stockholders were aware of the excessive loan, or of defendant's alleged liability in the premises, at the time they acquired their stock; or whether they possibly may now profit by an increase in the value of the shares in the event of a recovery against him.

It is clear from the language of § 5239, Rev. Stat. (Comp. Stat. § 9831, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 873), that every director knowingly participating in or assenting to a violation of any of the provisions of the act is "liable in his personal and individual capacity," without regard to the question whether other directors likewise are liable. The violation is in the nature of a tort, and the party injured may sue one or several of the joint participants. Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. 225 U. S. 111, 132, 56 L. ed. 1009, 1023, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 641, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 875. And the liability extends to "all damages which the association, its shareholders, or any other person, shall have sustained in consequence of such violation." In the present action the Bank represents the interest of its shareholders, as well as of its creditors; and if there was a violation of the act by defendant, with resulting diminution of its assets, the Bank is entitled to recover the damages thus sustained, notwithstanding it remained solvent, and irrespective of any changes in its stockholding interest or control occurring between the time the cause of action arose and the time of the commencement of the suit or of the trial. Even if it appeared that new stockholders acquired their interests with knowledge of the fact that such a loss had been sustained and that defendant was responsible for it, [85] neither they nor the Bank would be thereby estopped from having full recovery from defendant. There is no reason in the law to disentitle a purchaser of shares from even relying upon the responsibility of directors to make good previous losses as an element adding intrinsic value to the shares. Compare Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 457, 500, 71 Atl. 153.

(4) Defendant, among other defenses, pleaded the two-year Statute of Limitations of the state of Texas. Plaintiff demurred on the ground that this limitation was not a bar; and also replied, setting up certain facts that need not now be recited. The demurrer was overruled.

The provisions of the Texas statutes upon the subject are Vernon's Sayles's Civ. Stat. (Tex.) 1914, arts. 5687, 5688, and 5690, set forth in the margin.[1]

[86] In our opinion, the action is not one of the kinds specified in art. 5687, to which the two-year limitation applies, but is within the general description of art. 5690, and subject only to the limitation of four years. Hence the limitation pleaded was no defense; and it is not contended that there was any basis in fact for pleading the four-year limitation.

(5) Assuming the Fleming and Templeton notes were found to represent an excessive loan, knowingly participated in or assented to by defendant as a director of the Bank, in our opinion the cause of action against him accrued on or about June 10, 1907, when the Bank, through his act, parted with the money loaned, receiving in return only negotiable paper that it could not lawfully accept because the transaction was prohibited by § 5200, Rev. Stat. (Comp. Stat. § 9761, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 761). The damage as well as the injury was complete at that time, and the Bank was not obliged to await the maturity of the notes, because immediately it became the duty of the officers or directors who knowingly participated in making the excessive loan to undo the wrong done by taking the notes off the hands of the Bank and restoring to it the money that had been loaned. Of [87] course, whatever of value the Bank recovered from the borrowers on account of the loan would go in diminution of the damages; but the responsible officials would have no

[1] Art. 5687. There shall be commenced and prosecuted within two years after the cause of action shall have accrued, and not afterward, all actions or suits in court of the following description:

1. Actions of trespass for injury done to the estate or the property of another.

2. Actions for detaining the personal property of another, and for converting such personal property to one's own use.

3. Actions for taking or carrying away the goods and chattels of another.

4. Actions for debt where the indebtedness is not evidenced by a contract in writing.

5. Actions upon stated or open accounts, other than such mutual and current accounts as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or agents. In all accounts, except those between merchant and merchant, as aforesaid, their factors and agents, the respective times or dates of the delivery of the several articles charged shall be particularly specified, and limitations shall run against each item from the date of such delivery, unless otherwise specially contracted.

6. Action for injury done to the person of another.

7. Action for injury done to the person of another where death ensued from such injury; and the cause of action shall be considered as having accrued at the death of the party injured.

Art. 5688. There shall be commenced and prosecuted within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued, and not afterward, all actions or suits in court of the following description:

1. Actions for debt where the indebtedness is evidenced by or founded upon any contract in writing.

2. Actions for the penalty or for damages on the penal clause of a bond to convey real estate.

3. Actions by one partner against his copartner for a settlement of the partnership accounts, or upon mutual and current accounts concerning the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or agents; and the cause of action shall be considered as having accrued on a cessation of the dealings in which they were interested together.

Art. 5690. Every action other than for the recovery of real estate, for which no limitation is otherwise prescribed, shall be brought within four years next after the right to bring the same shall have accrued, and not afterward.

right to require the Bank to pursue its remedies against the borrowers or await the liquidation of their estates. The liability imposed by the statute upon the director is a direct liability, not contingent or collateral.

(6) The question is raised whether the entire sum loaned, plus interest and less salvage, should be treated as damages sustained by the Bank through the violation of the provisions of § 5200, Rev. Stat.,—assuming it be found that defendant did knowingly violate them,—or whether only the excess above what lawfully might have been loaned (presumably $20,000) should be so regarded. We assume that if, in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, defendant had made a loan of $20,000 to Fleming and Templeton, and if, while this loan remained unpaid, he had afterwards and as a separate transaction unlawfully loaned them an additional $10,000, in excess of the limit, the damage legally attributable to his violation of the limiting provision would have been but $10,000. But that is not this case. According to the evidence, the $30,000, less discount, was paid out by the Bank as a single payment; and if the jury found it to have been loaned in excess of the statutory limit (whether in form one loan or two) it must be upon the ground that it was a single transaction. That being so, it would follow that the entire amount disbursed by the Bank was disbursed in violation of the law. The cause of action against a director knowingly participating in or assenting to such excessive loan would be complete at that moment, and entire; there would be no legal presumption that the borrowers would have accepted a loan within the limit, if their application for the excessive loan had been refused; nor that a director who in fact violated his duty as defined by law would, if mindful of it, have loaned them even $20,000. To mitigate in his favor [88] the damages resulting from a breach of his statutory duty by resorting to the hypothesis that if he had not disregarded the law in this respect he would have pursued a different course of action within the law, would be an unwarranted resort to fiction in aid of a wrongdoer, and at the expense of the party injured. Hence, the entire excessive loan would have to be regarded as the basis for computing the damages of the Bank.

(7) In behalf of defendant it is insisted that, assuming the loan was excessive, no loss accrued to the Bank by reason of it, because the Fleming and Templeton notes and indebtedness were transferred to the loan company February 12, 1908, for a cash consideration equivalent to their face value, less interest to maturity.

Plaintiff in error contends that the Bank and the loan company were so identical in ownership and united in management that the latter was but the alter ego of the former, and a loss to the loan company on the notes was the same as a loss to the Bank, not only practically, but in contemplation of law. On the other hand, the argument of defendant in error regards the two corporations as if they were wholly independent; treats the transfer of the notes from the Bank to the loan company, in February, 1908, as valid, and the money or credit contemporaneously transferred to the Bank like money coming from an outside party; and looks upon the retransfer in January, 1910, as voluntary on the part of the Bank and an unnecessary assumption of a loss that otherwise it had escaped.

We cannot accede to either contention in the extreme. Because the Bank and the loan company were distinct legal organizations, operating under separate charters, derived from different sources, and possessing independent powers and privileges, we are constrained to hold that, notwithstanding the identity of stock ownership and their close affiliation in management, for some purposes they must be regarded as separate corporations; for [89] instance, as being capable in law of contracting with each other. See Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 136 U. S. 356, 372, 373, 375, et seq., 34 L. ed. 363, 367, 368, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1004. But, in considering the practical effect of such intercorporate dealings, especially as bearing upon the duties of the common directors and the authority of the stockholders to control them, we need not and ought not to overlook the identity of stock ownership. Thus, the transfer of the notes in February, 1908, from the Bank to the loan company, in consideration of their full face value ostensibly or actually paid by the company to the Bank, evidently could have no effect in relieving the stockholding interest from loss, since each stockholder of one corporation had a corresponding interest in the stock of the other, and any theoretical saving that accrued to him as a stockholder of the Bank was balanced by a corresponding loss sustained in his capacity as a stockholder of the company. At the same time the stockholders, in reviewing that transaction, might lawfully and properly base their action upon all the facts of the situation; recognizing the legal separateness of the corporations as existing in order to test the validity of the transfer and the feasibility of setting it aside without litigation, while giving effect to their community of interest in deciding whether this should be done, and, if so, then in what manner and upon what terms.

(8) Regarding the two corporations as legally separate, and ignoring for the moment the community of stockholding interest, it is plain that the transaction of February 12, 1908, in which the Bank sold the Fleming and Templeton notes and indebtedness to the loan company for their full face value, was prima facie tantamount to a satisfaction of the damages that the Bank had sustained by reason of the excessive loan; but that it had this effect, only provided the transaction was good and valid as against the loan company and its stockholders, or was duly ratified by them. For if it was invalid, or was made [90] under circumstances rendering it voidable by the loan company, or the stockholders, neither the Bank nor defendant was entitled to have the transaction stand for their benefit; and if in fact it was avoided for good cause, the Bank would be entitled to its action against defendant the same as if the annulled transaction never had occurred.

Was there good cause for the rescission? The fact that the same persons were directors and managers of both corporations subjects their dealings inter sese to close scrutiny. That two corporations have a majority or even the whole membership of their boards of directors in common does not necessarily render transactions between them void; but transactions resulting from the agency of officers or directors acting at the same time for both must be deemed presumptively fraudulent unless expressly authorized or ratified by the stockholders; and certainly where the circumstances show, as by the undisputed evidence they tended to show in this case, that the transaction would be of great advantage to one corporation at the expense of the other, especially where, in addition to this, the personal interests of the directors or any of them would be enhanced at the expense of the stockholders, the transaction is voidable by the stockholders within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud. Twin-Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 589, 23 L. ed. 329, 330, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 688; Wardell v. Union P. R. Co. 103 U. S. 651, 657, et seq., 26 L. ed. 509, 511, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 144; Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522, 524, 27 L. ed. 1018, 1019, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 315; Richardson v. Green (Washburn v. Green) 133 U. S. 30, 43, 33 L. ed. 516, 521, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280; McGourkey v. Toledo & O. C. R. Co. 146 U. S. 536, 552, 565, 36 L. ed. 1079, 1085, 1090, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 170.

The evidence having tended to show a transfer of the notes in question from the Bank to the loan company "without recourse," for a consideration equivalent to their full face value, after the insolvency of the makers had been brought to light, with resulting discredit of the notes as marketable paper and probable inability of the makers to pay them,—a transaction carried out by directors and [91] officers who acted as agents or trustees for both corporations, and one at least of whom, as the jury might find, was subject to criticism from the Comptroller of the Currency, and to an action at the suit of the Bank, for making an excessive loan,—it clearly was open to the jury to find that the transfer was fraudulent as against the loan company, and as against the stockholders of both companies. The jury should have been instructed to this effect; and further, that if they found the transfer to have been fraudulent, the stockholders had the right to rescind it within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud; and that if, having such right, the stockholders of the loan company asserted it and gave notice of its claim to the Bank in the manner shown by the minutes, and the Bank, recognizing and acknowledging the justness of the claim, restored to the loan company what was accepted as the equivalent in value of that which the Bank had received in the transaction of February, 1908, this was not to be regarded as a voluntary or unnecessary assumption of loss by the Bank, but, on the contrary, the result, so far as defendant was concerned, was the same as if by court decree, in a suit brought by the loan company, or by the stockholders, the Bank had been compelled to make such restitution; and that thereafter the rescinded transaction could not be regarded as amounting, even in form of law, to a satisfaction of the damages sustained by the Bank as a result of the Fleming and Templeton loan.

So far as the evidence showed, neither the stockholders of the loan company, nor, indeed, its board of directors, ever expressly ratified or affirmed the transfer. Nor does it appear that there was any unreasonable delay on the part of the stockholders in taking action to set it aside after they had become aware of the circumstances; such delay as there was the bank waived, as it had a right to do; and defendant does not appear to have changed his position or to have been prejudiced by reason of it.

[92] Assuming, in defendant's favor, that because the corporations were legally separate they could not undo the transaction of February, 1908, without formal corporate action, the procedure adopted was sufficient for the purpose. It is objected that the personnel of the boards was changed for the very purpose of accomplishing the rescission, and that the new members were mere figureheads or dummies for the controlling stockholders, and had no bona fide stock of their own. But if the transaction of 1908 was a fraud as against the loan company, and done without authority of the stockholders, they were quite within their rights in acting through dummies if necessary in order to set it aside. We do not think it was necessary to change the membership of the boards; similar action by boards having identical membership would have had the same effect, if done by the express authority of the stockholders in order to undo an improper and unlawful act of former directors, injurious to their interests.

It is said that the rescission was put through in order to enable the Bank to bring the present action against defendant. But it was not done to build up a ground of action against him, for this arose, if at all, prior to February 12, 1908, the damage to the Bank being sustained when, with his participation and assent, its money was paid to Fleming and Templeton in June, 1907, for promissory notes that the Bank could not lawfully take. Defendant's liability to the Bank, if he was liable, was direct and primary, and to it the notes occupied the status of collateral security. Had the disposition made of them in February, 1908, been valid and unassailable, it would have borne the appearance of a satisfaction of the damages only because the two corporations were legally separate; but in substance, so far as the stockholders were concerned, it would have satisfied nothing, because it merely transferred money to them in one capacity by taking it from them in another. Defendant had no right to have the transaction remain [93] in effect as a screen to protect him from suit by the Bank under § 5239, Rev. Stat. So far as it may be supposed to have protected him while it remained unrescinded, the result was entirely gratuitous, no consideration having proceeded from him in the matter. Indeed, if his act in shifting the discredited loan was done in part to give him immunity from such an action as the present, this would furnish an additional ground entitling the stockholders to set the transfer aside. And if, either on this ground, or on the ground that the transfer was put through for the advantage of one corporation at the expense of the other by officers or directors acting at the same time for both, and without the authority of the stockholders, the transaction was voidable by the stockholders and they resolved to avoid it, it would savor of absurdity to sustain defendant's contention that this was done in order to enable the Bank to sue him; for, of course, they would have the right to do it for that very purpose.

(9) In defendant's behalf it is insisted that, at the time of the proceedings of January, 1910, the value of the cotton-mill property was much less than $65,000, so that, in the exchange made, the Bank in effect parted with little or no value for the return to it of the Fleming and Templeton notes and indebtedness. But for reasons already sufficiently indicated, we are of opinion that defendant is not entitled to raise an inquiry into the value of this property, as bearing either upon the question of the Bank's right of action against him or upon the question of damages. If the loan company or the stockholders had good ground for rescinding the 1908 transaction, and this was done pursuant to their resolution, they might waive a return of the precise consideration and accept such equivalent in exchange as to them seemed proper. Because of the identity of the stockholding interest, the transaction, even while it stood, was, as we have shown, only a pseudo-satisfaction of the Bank's loss in the Fleming [94] and Templeton loan; and when the real parties affected by this loss undertook on just grounds to set aside the transfer of the notes, and took such proceedings through action of the two corporations as were necessary for that purpose, they had a right to recognize the community of interest in settling the terms upon which this should be done; and defendant has no standing to complain.

If there be a seeming inconsistency in sustaining a rescission of the 1908 transaction avowedly based upon the ground that the loan company had unjustly been subjected to a loss therein, while at the same time we treat as unimportant the question whether, upon such rescission, full restitution was made to that company, it should be said that we treat it as unimportant only so far as defendant is concerned; and if there be inconsistency, it is no more than corrective of the unreality of the 1908 transaction itself. It is defendant who invokes that transaction as an actual realization by the Bank of full value through a sale of the notes that it held as collateral security for its claim against him. If, regarding it as an actual sale, it was voidable because done by agents acting at the same time in a dual capacity or for other reasons, he cannot complain that the parties entitled to avoid it treated it as actual for the purpose of setting it aside, and in the consequent readjustment recognized a substantial identity of interest between seller and purchaser in the rescinded transaction that rendered it hardly an actual sale. For, to the extent that the sale was a sham, there was no realization by the Bank upon the collateral security, and hence no satisfaction of the damages claimed against him.

The judgment under review must be reversed, to the end that there may be a new trial in accordance with the views above expressed.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded to the District Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Taxes — validity — limitations of Federal Constitution.

1. When the Federal Supreme Court is called upon to test a state tax by the provisions of the Federal Constitution, its decision must depend, not upon the form of the taxing scheme, or any characterization of it adopted by the courts of the state, but rather upon the practical application and effect of the tax as applied and enforced.

[For other cases, see Taxes I. a, 1, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Commerce — licenses and taxes — peddlers and drummers — wholesalers.

2. A nonresident manufacturer of "soft drinks" doing a business in a municipality in the state which largely consists in carrying a supply of such drinks from one retailer's place of business to another's upon the vehicle in which the goods were brought across the state line, exposing them for sale, soliciting and negotiating sales, and immediately delivering the goods sold in the original unbroken cases, may be required to take out the license required of all wholesalers in soft drinks without infringing the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Argued November 10 and 11, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court of Kenton County, in that state, in favor of defendant in an action to recover back certain license fees exacted under municipal ordinances, and to enjoin the enforcement of a later ordinance calling for further like payments. Affirmed.

Peddlers and drummers as related to interstate commerce.

Earlier cases considering this question will be found in a note appended to Stockard v. Morgan, 46 L. ed. 785.

A statute cannot be sustained as a valid exercise of the police power of the state to tax the occupation of peddlers which defines peddlers in such a way as to include persons engaged in interstate commerce, and taxes them as such. Crenshaw v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 389, 57 L. ed. 565, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 294.

So, a statute which imposes a license fee upon peddlers, hawkers, and solicitors places an unconstitutional burden upon interstate commerce in so far as it is made to apply to the solicitor for a nonresident concern. Re Kinyon, 9 Idaho, 642, 75 Pac. 268, 2 Ann. Cas. 699.

The business of traveling from place to place, taking orders and transmitting them to a nonresident manufacturer, for articles to be delivered in fulfilment of such orders, and which are in fact shipped in interstate commerce and delivered to the persons who ordered them, or the business of making such deliveries, cannot, consistently with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, be subjected to a state license tax. Crenshaw v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 389, 57 L. ed. 565, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 294 (solicitor for ranges); Rogers v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 401, 57 L. ed. 569, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 298 (solicitor for buggies); Clark v. State, 4 Ala. App. 202, 59 So. 236, writ of certiorari denied in 180 Ala. 529, 61 So. 901 (solicitor for lightning rods); Miller v. State, 7 Ala. App. 183, 62 So. 307 (delivery man for sewing machines).

One who solicits orders for goods for a nonresident concern, and who, the goods being shipped to him in one package, breaks the original package, and delivers to each customer the article ordered by him, and receives the price therefor, is engaged in interstate commerce, and a statute making it a misdemeanor for a peddler or itinerant trader to sell goods, wares, or merchandise without a license is not operative against him. Stone v. State, 117 Ga. 292, 43 S. E. 740.

And one who, from samples, solicits orders for the products of a nonresident manufacturer, the goods being shipped to him in one large package, but each customer's order being wrapped separately, with his name marked thereon, which smaller packages he delivers to the customers, and receives the money therefor, is engaged in interstate commerce, and is not subject to a municipal ordinance which provides "that traveling salesmen or dealers who shall bargain or sell any goods, wares, or merchandise . . . for cash or by sample, or any other manner, for present or future delivery" within the corporate limits of the city, shall pay a license fee. Cason v. Quinby, 60 Fla. 35, 53 So. 741.

So, one is engaged in interstate commerce, and not required to take out a state license, who, as agent for a nonresident drug company, takes orders for patent medicines, sends the orders in to the drug company, which fills them, wraps each order, separately marked with the name of the customer, and ships them to its agent within the state, who delivers the packages in their original form. State v. Trotman, 142 N. C. 662, 55 S. E. 599.

A state may not, consistently with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, impose a license tax upon a nonresident merchant, traveling from place to place within the state and soliciting orders by sample, lists, and catalogues, for groceries which are afterwards shipped into the state in carload lots to his order, and which he delivers from the cars to the persons ordering them. Stewart v. Michigan, 232 U. S. 665, 58 L. ed. 786, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 476.

Interstate commerce is unlawfully burdened by a municipal ordinance exacting a license fee from a person employed by a foreign corporation to solicit within the municipality orders for groceries which the company fills by shipping goods to him for the delivery to and collection of the purchase price from the purchasers, who have the right to refuse the goods if not equal to the sample, such goods always being shipped in distinct packages, corresponding to the several orders, except in the case of brooms, which, after being tagged and marked like the other articles, according to the number ordered, are then tied together in bundles of about a dozen, wrapped up conveniently for shipment. Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 51 L. ed. 295, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159.

And one who solicits orders for a nonresident grocery house, the orders being sent to the grocery house, where they are filled, each order being wrapped separately, and shipped in one large box to the solicitor, who delivers the packages to the persons ordering them, collecting for the same, and transmitting the money to the grocery concern, is engaged in interstate commerce, and is not required to take out a peddler's license. Menke v. State, 70 Neb. 669, 97 N. W. 1020.

A municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon peddlers is invalid, as a restraint upon interstate commerce, in so far as it is made to apply to the solicitor for a nonresident tea house, who solicits orders for teas, coffees, etc., when such orders are sent to the home office, where they are put up in packages according to the quantities designated by the solicitor, but without the purchaser's name being written on the package, and are shipped back to the solicitor, who gets them from the railroad station, delivers them to the purchasers, collecting the price. Jewel Tea Co. v. Lee's Summit, 189 Fed. 280. The court stated that the shipment of the goods from the home office to the solicitor, the draying of them from the depot to the street in front of the customer's house, and the carrying them into the house, are all parts of one transaction, and that transaction is interstate commerce. A shipment like that cannot be divided into parts, so as to make one or more parts an intrastate shipment. They must all be taken and regarded as one shipment, and when across a state line it is an interstate shipment, and is covered by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

A state license tax required of itinerant vendors is an interference with interstate commerce in so far as applied to a salesman who travels from place to place, taking orders from samples for ranges manufactured by a nonresident concern, where the ranges are shipped into the state, and delivered to the purchaser in their original package. Wrought Range Co. v. Campen, 135 N. C. 506, 47 S. E. 658.

And the license tax imposed by North Carolina Laws 1901, p. 116, § 52, upon all those engaged in the business of selling sewing machines in the state, is an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce so far as applied to the sale of a single machine shipped into the state by a nonresident manufacturing corporation upon the written order of a customer, under an ordinary C. O. D. consignment. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sims, 191 U. S. 441, 48 L. ed. 254, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151.

A statute which assumes to impose a license fee upon one who solicits orders for buggies, which are transmitted to a nonresident manufacturer, the buggies to be delivered in fulfilment of such orders, is unconstitutional, as placing a burden upon interstate commerce. Wilcox v. People, 46 Colo. 382, 104 Pac. 408; State v. Byles, 22 Wyo. 136, 136 Pac. 114.

be regarded as a part of the interstate transaction between the nonresident manufacturer and the customer. Davis v. Virginia, 236 U. S. 697, 59 L. ed. 795, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 479.

But where a sale is made of goods theretofore shipped into the state, which, by reason of having been taken from their original package, or from some other cause, had ceased to be articles of interstate commerce, the transaction is not within the protection of the commerce clause.

Thus, one who goes about from place to place selling patent medicines of a nonresident manufacturer which the manufacturer has put up in small bottles and packages ready for use, and has shipped in bulk to such peddler, is not engaged in interstate commerce, and so is required to take out a peddler's license. Smith v. Wilkins, 164 N. C. 135, 80 S. E. 168.

Also one who establishes a line of credit with a nonresident merchant, and on his own account sells such merchant's goods from door to door, or takes orders for goods which he may not have with him, and delivers them on his next trip, is not engaged in interstate commerce, and so is liable for the license fees imposed upon peddlers and hawkers. Ballard v. Russell, 145 La. 636, 82 So. 730.

Nor would it alter the situation were he to sell such goods in such manner as the agent or representative of such nonresident merchant. Ibid.

Although one may be engaged in interstate commerce as to goods which he is delivering, which have been previously contracted for, yet he is not engaged in interstate commerce as to goods which he takes with him at the same time, and as to which negotiations for sale had not been made before they were brought into the state. Newport v. French Bros. Bauer Co. 169 Ky. 174, 183 S. W. 532.

And a statute forbidding the sale by an itinerant vendor of any except certain classes of articles without first obtaining a license, and which makes no distinction between articles produced in the state and those produced without, is not repugnant to the power given to Congress to regulate commerce, as applied to an agent of a nonresident wagon manufacturer, who has wagons and parts of wagons shipped to him from his employer, and, after unpacking them, puts the parts together and proceeds from place to place, offering the wagons for sale. Territory v. Russell, 13 N. M. 558, 86 Pac. 551.

Also one who solicits orders for the goods of a nonresident concern is not engaged in interstate commerce where the orders are never transmitted beyond the state, or accepted or filled by anyone beyond the state, but are filled from goods which he orders sent to him in bulk, and for which he pays as soon as they arrive. Re Prindle, 67 Kan. 364, 72 Pac. 864.

And a solicitor for aluminum ware of a nonresident manufacturer was held, in Eldorado Springs v. Highfill, 268 Mo. 501, 188 S. W. 68, not to be engaged in interstate commerce, and so bound to take out a canvasser's license, where the facts were that the goods were sold by the solicitor on condition that they would be satisfactory on examination; the solicitor sent no names of purchasers to the manufacturer, but ordered goods sufficient to cover prospective sales, the goods being shipped to him in bulk, and paid for by him or security given for the value at time of arrival; the goods were then sorted by the solicitor, and were delivered in accordance with the conditional sale, and, if satisfactory, were paid for, the solicitor having an agreement that on any order goods to a certain value not accepted by purchasers might be returned to the manufacturer at its expense. The court said that the interstate character of the shipment ceased upon the delivery of the goods by the foreign corporation to the solicitor, and the goods thereafter not moving in interstate commerce, the transactions became local in their nature.

A current of commerce created by importing goods from one state into another continues until they have reached their final destination. A temporary interruption necessary to consummate a purchase does not destroy the interstate character of the transaction.

wrapped separately, and marked with the purchaser's name, and then shipped to a delivery agent of such concern, who delivers them to the purchaser, is not required to take out a license, as he is engaged in interstate commerce. People v. Erickson, 147 N. Y. Supp. 226.

A municipal ordinance which imposes a license tax upon an agent for a nonresident manufacturer of "near beer" is invalid, as placing a burden upon interstate commerce, where the sole purpose of the ordinance is to make this class of business pay a certain tax for the general revenues of the city, without regard to matters of health, peace, or public morality. Loh v. Macon, 8 Ga. App. 744, 70 S. E. 149.

And an act of Congress imposing a license on brewers' agents was held, in Beitzell v. District of Columbia, 21 App. D. C. 49, not to apply to one who solicited orders for the products of a brewery located outside of the District, the orders being sent to the brewery, where they were filled and shipped direct to the consumer, the solicitor having no place in the District for the transaction of business or for the storage of the brewery's products.

But the annual license charge imposed by a state law upon the business of selling or offering for sale intoxicating liquors within the state by any traveling salesman who solicits orders in quantities of less than 5 gallons cannot be regarded, when applied to interstate transactions, as repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, in view of the provisions of a Federal statute that intoxicating liquors coming into the state shall be as completely under its control as if manufactured therein. Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 51 L. ed. 724, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, 10 Ann. Cas. 733.

Agents for a nonresident manufacturer, who solicits orders for pictures to be enlarged, and also agents who deliver and collect for such pictures after they are enlarged, are engaged in interstate commerce, and so are not liable to a tax imposed upon peddlers and hawkers. Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. 336, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229; Chicago Portrait Co. v. Macon, 147 Fed. 967; Ex parte Hull, 153 Fed. 459; Re Julius, 26 Ohio C. C. 423.

Nor does the fact that the delivering agents, at the time of delivery of the pictures previously ordered, sell frames therefor, make such delivery agents peddlers within the meaning of a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon peddlers and hawkers. Caldwell v. North Carolina, supra; Chicago Portrait Co. v. Macon, 147 Fed. 967; Re Julius, supra.

The sale within the state of a frame for a portrait made in another state to fill an order taken by a solicitor in the former state cannot be so separated from the rest of the dealings between the nonresident maker and the purchaser as to sustain the imposition of a license tax, under Alabama Act of March 7, 1907, § 17, where the order for the portrait contemplated its delivery in an appropriate frame, which the purchaser of the portrait should have the option of buying at the factory price. Dozier v. Alabama, 218 U. S. 124, 54 L. ed. 965, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 264, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649. By this decision it is now settled that where the selling of the frame is a mere incident to the taking of the order for the portrait, it is within the protection of the commerce clause,—a question concerning which there had been much conflict prior to this decision.

Also an agent of a nonresident portrait manufacturer to whom the latter sends portraits made to fill orders taken by local solicitors, and, in a separate parcel, frames suitable for such portraits, the orders for which contemplate delivery in appropriate frames, which the customers may select at wholesale prices, cannot constitutionally be required to take out a peddler's license when engaged in putting the portraits into separate frames, delivering them, and offering the customers a choice of the different styles of frame, the customers taking one or none, at their option, since any sale of the frames must is not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce, as applied to a foreign corporation which maintains a store or regular place of business in each county, from which all of the local agents in such county are supplied with sewing machines and appurtenances to be taken into the rural districts for sale or for rent, all transactions entering into such sales or renting being completed within a single county. Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Brickell, 233 U. S. 304, 58 L. ed. 974, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493.

So, the business of erecting lightning rods within the corporate limits as the agent of a nonresident manufacturer on whose behalf such agent has solicited orders for the sale of such rods, and from whom he had received the rods when shipped into the state on such orders, may be subjected to a municipal license tax without violating the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, although the contract under which the rods were shipped bound the seller, at his own expense, to attach them to the houses of the persons who ordered them. Browning v. Waycross, 233 U. S. 16, 58 L. ed. 828, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578.

The state may make the license tax on the right to sell certain classes of goods by sample to consumers by canvassing from house to house apply to goods shipped from foreign states, when it applies equally to those of domestic origin. State v. Bayer, 34 Utah, 257, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 297, 97 Pac. 129.

In Ex parte Crowder, 171 Fed. 250, an agent for a nonresident carriage company solicited and received an order for a buggy, to be subsequently delivered. The sale was consummated by the delivery of a buggy from a stock kept by the manufacturer in a warehouse within the state. The agent, not having taken out a license, as required by statute of those engaged in the business of peddling, was arrested for violating the statute. In discharging a writ of habeas corpus and remanding the petitioner, the court stated that the statute was strictly a police and revenue statute, applicable to business to be transacted wholly within the state, and did not create an invidious burden upon interstate or foreign commerce, since it was general in its application, bearing evenly upon all peddlers without discriminating against persons, whether residents or nonresidents of the state, nor against commodities, whether produced within the state or imported from other states or countries.

A statute which provides that "it shall be unlawful for any person to travel from place to place in any county of this state for the purpose of carrying to sell, or exposing or offering to sell, barter, or exchange any goods, wares, merchandise or any other property whatever, without first obtaining a license therefor from the auditor of said county," is not unconstitutional, as placing a burden upon interstate commerce, since the act only includes persons traveling from place to place, carrying the goods which they sell, and does not include persons inducing sales of goods by sample for future delivery. Re Lipschitz, 14 N. D. 622, 95 N. W. 157.

Discrimination against manufactures or products of other states.

A statute forbidding without license the canvassing for or selling by sample of goods made in another state, after they have been shipped into the state passing the statute, while permitting such canvassing for domestic goods, violates the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. State v. Bayer, 34 Utah, 257, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 297, 97 Pac. 129.

And so a statute is unconstitutional and inoperative in so far as it requires a license of one who travels from place to place selling carriages which have been shipped into the state and does not require the same license of one who sells carriages which are of domestic manufacture. Ibid.

Also a municipal ordinance which imposes a license fee upon anyone who sells foreign-grown fruit from a wagon discriminates in favor of home-grown fruit and against foreign fruit, and so is an attempted interference with interstate commerce. State v. Bornstein, 107 Me. 260, 78 Atl. 281.

There is also a distinction between the right to impose a tax on an importer who is using persons licensed by the state to make sales for him within the state, and the right to impose a tax on the importer himself for making such sales, as is sought to be done here.

And in Com. v. Caldwell, 190 Mass. 355, 112 Am. St. Rep. 334, 76 N. E. 955, 5 Ann. Cas. 879, it was held that a statute which discriminated between agricultural products of the United States and those of other countries in reference to the requirement of a license fee to peddle the latter was an attempted interference with foreign commerce.

So, too, a statute which imposes a license tax upon solicitors for a nonresident portrait concern, and which provides that such statute shall not apply to merchants or dealers having a permanent place of business in the state, and keeping picture frames as part of their stock in trade, is invalid as an unjust discrimination in restraint of interstate commerce, as against nonresident concerns. Ex parte Hull, 153 Fed. 459.

A state statute imposing a heavy license tax upon the right to canvass from house to house for a certain limited number of articles not produced or manufactured within the state, and not injurious to health or morals, for the apparent purpose of favoring resident merchants with established places of business, violates the provisions of the Federal Constitution against abridging the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States, and denying the equal protection of the laws. Mr. A. E. Stricklett argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

The plaintiffs in error bring their merchandise, consisting of soft drinks, into the city of Covington, Kentucky, from Cincinnati, in the state of Ohio, on their own vehicles, without having received from their customers in the city of Covington previous orders or requests therefor, and there and then sell and deliver the same to the retail dealers in the city of Covington. These transactions are not interstate commerce, nor in any way directly connected with such commerce.

The judgment of the court of appeals of Kentucky is based on findings of facts which exclude a Federal question, and which this court accepts as conclusive; therefore the writ of error should be denied.

The writ of error should be denied because the judgment of the court of appeals of Kentucky is based on grounds sufficiently broad to sustain it, over which this court has no jurisdiction.

Kirmeyer v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 568–570, 59 L. ed. 721–723, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by plaintiffs in error in a state court of Kentucky against the city of Covington, a [99] municipal corporation of that state, to recover license fees theretofore paid by them under certain ordinances of the city for the conduct of their business in Covington, and to enjoin the enforcement against them of a later ordinance calling for further like payments. The several ordinances, each in its turn, required all persons carrying on certain specified businesses in the city to take out licenses and pay license fees; among others, the business of wholesale dealer in what are known as "soft drinks." Plaintiffs were and are manufacturers of such drinks, having their factory and bottling works in the city of Cincinnati, in the state of Ohio, on the opposite side of the Ohio river from Covington. They have carried on and do carry on the business of selling in Covington soft drinks, the product of their manufacture, in the following manner: They have a list of retail dealers in Covington to whom they have been and are in the habit of making sales; two or three times a week a wagon or other vehicle owned by plaintiffs is loaded at the factory in Cincinnati and sent across the river to Covington, and calls upon the retail dealers mentioned, many of whom have been for years on plaintiffs' list and have purchased their goods under a general understanding that plaintiffs' vehicle would call occasionally and furnish them with such soft drinks as they might need or desire to purchase from plaintiffs; when a customer's place of business is reached by the vehicle the driver goes into the storeroom and either asks or looks to see what amount of drinks is needed or wanted; he then goes out to the vehicle and brings from it the necessary quantity, which he carries into the store and delivers to the customer; upon his trips to Covington he always carries sufficient drinks to meet the probable demands of the customers, based on past experience; but, with the exception of occasional small amounts carried for delivery in response to particular orders previously received at plaintiffs' place of business in Cincinnati, all [100] sales in Covington are made from the vehicle by the driver in the manner mentioned. Sometimes the driver succeeds in selling there the entire supply thus carried upon the wagon, sometimes only a part thereof; or he may return after having made but a few sales, or none at all; in which event he carries the unsold supply back to plaintiffs' place of business in Cincinnati. The soft drinks in question are delivered in stopped bottles or siphons, according to their nature, and these are placed (at the bottling works) in separate wooden or metal cases, each case being open at the top and holding a certain number of bottles or siphons, according to the nature of the drinks and the custom of the trade; the filled bottles or siphons are carried upon the vehicle, sold, and delivered in these cases, each case remaining entire and unbroken, and nothing less than a case being sold or delivered. The retail dealers usually pay cash, and purchase only the contents of the bottles, while the bottles and cases remain the property of plaintiffs and are subsequently collected, when empty, by plaintiffs' drivers or agents on their regular visits; there are, however, a few customers who pay for and thereafter own the bottles in which distilled water is delivered. The ordinances were and are respectively applicable to all wholesale dealers in such soft drinks in Covington, whether the goods were or are manufactured within or without the state.

The trial court, and, on appeal, the court of appeals of Kentucky, gave judgment for defendant, overruling the contention of plaintiffs that the ordinances as carried into effect against them were repugnant to the "commerce clause" (art. 1, § 8) of the Constitution of the United States (177 Ky. 385, 197 S. W. 806), and upon this Federal question the case is brought here by writ of error.

It is important to observe the precise point that we have to determine. It is indisputable that, with respect to the goods occasionally carried upon plaintiff's wagon from one [101] state to the other, in response to orders previously received at their place of business in Cincinnati, plaintiffs are engaged in interstate commerce, not subject to the licensing power of the Kentucky municipality. The court of appeals in the present case, in line with its previous decisions in Newport v. Wagner, 168 Ky. 641, 646, 182 S. W. 834, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 962, and Newport v. French Bros. Bauer Co. 169 Ky. 174, 183 S. W. 532, recognizing the authority of the decisions of this court bearing upon the subject, conceded that this part of plaintiffs' business was not subject to state regulation (177 Ky. 388). At the same time the court held that, with respect to the remaining and principal part of the business conducted in Covington, that which consists in carrying a supply of goods from place to place upon wagons, exposing them for sale, soliciting and negotiating sales, and immediately delivering the goods sold, plaintiffs were subject to the licensing ordinances; and it is with this alone that we have to deal. If, with respect to this portion of their business, plaintiffs may be subjected to the regulatory power of the state, acting through the municipality, we are not concerned with the question whether the general language of the ordinances, if applied with respect to some other method of dealing with goods brought from state to state, might be repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

From the facts recited it is evident that, in essence, that part of plaintiffs' business which is subjected to regulation is the business of itinerant vender or peddler,—a traveling from place to place within the state, selling goods that are carried about with the seller for the purpose. Plaintiffs in error insist that this view of the matter is untenable because the courts of Kentucky have held that sales made to a retail merchant for resale do not constitute peddling within the meaning of the statutes of that state. Standard Oil Co. v. Com. 107 Ky. 606, 609, 55 S. W. 8; Newport v. French Bros. Bauer Co. 169 [102] Ky. 174, 185, 183 S. W. 532. These decisions however, deal merely with a question of statutory definition; and it hardly is necessary to repeat that when this court is called upon to test a state tax by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, our decision must depend not upon the form of the taxing scheme, or any characterization of it adopted by the courts of the state, but rather upon the practical operation and effect of the tax as applied and enforced. The state court could not render valid, by misdescribing it, a tax law which in substance and effect was repugnant to the Federal Constitution; neither can it render unconstitutional a tax that, in its actual effect, violates no constitutional provision, by inaccurately defining it. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 362, 59 L. ed. 265, 271, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99.

We have, then, a state tax upon the business of an itinerant vender of goods as carried on within the state,—a tax applicable alike to all such dealers, irrespective of where their goods are manufactured, and without discrimination against goods manufactured in other states. It is settled by repeated decisions of this court that a license regulation or tax of this nature, imposed by a state with respect to the making of such sales of goods within its borders, is not to be deemed a regulation of or direct burden upon interstate commerce, although enforced impartially with respect to goods manufactured without as well as within the state, and does not conflict with the "commerce clause." Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123, 140, 19 L. ed. 382, 387; Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754; Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 68, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367; Baccus v. Louisiana, 232 U. S. 334, 58 L. ed. 627, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439.

The peddler's license tax considered in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, was denounced only because it amounted to a discrimination against the products of other states, and therefore to an interference with commerce among the states. To the same effect, Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 454, 29 L. ed. 691, 693, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454.

[103] Of course the transportation of plaintiffs' goods across the state line is of itself interstate commerce; but it is not this that is taxed by the city of Covington, nor is such commerce a part of the business that is taxed, or anything more than a preparation for it. So far as the itinerant vending is concerned, the goods might just as well have been manufactured within the state of Kentucky: to the extent that plaintiffs dispose of their goods in that kind of sales, they make them the subject of local commerce; and this being so, they can claim no immunity from local regulation, whether the goods remain in original packages or not.

The distinction between state regulation of peddlers and the attempt to impose like regulations upon drummers who solicit sales of goods that are to be thereafter transported in interstate commerce has always been recognized. In Robbins v. Shelby Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, Mr. Justice Bradley, who spoke for the court, said (p. 497): "When goods are sent from one state to another for sale, or in consequence of a sale, they become part of its general property, and amenable to its laws; provided that no discrimination be made against them as goods from another state, and that they be not taxed by reason of being brought from another state, but only taxed in the usual way as other goods are. Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091; Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754. But to tax the sale of such goods, or the offer to sell them, before they are brought into the state, is a very different thing, and seems to us clearly a tax on interstate commerce." See also Crenshaw v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 389, 399, 400, 57 L. ed. 565, 568, 569, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 294, where the distinction was clearly set forth. And in all the "drummer cases" the fact has appeared that there was no selling from a stock of goods carried for the purpose, but only a solicitation of sales, with or without the exhibition of samples; the goods sold to be thereafter transported from without the state. Rogers v. Arkansas, 227 U. S. 401, 408, 57 L. ed. 569, 572, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 298; [104] Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 38 L. ed. 719, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 658, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829; Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. 336, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229; Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 510, 51 L. ed. 295, 296, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159; Dozier v. OKLAHOMA RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

SEVERNS PAVING COMPANY and the City of Oklahoma City.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 104-107.)

Error to state court — proper judgment — saving right to hearing.

1. A judgment of the highest court of a state which, by affirming, without more, a judgment of the trial court directing a reassessment against the property itself instead of against a street railway company of the share of the expense of a pavement properly apportioned to a central strip in a highway owned in fee by the street railway company, leaves in serious doubt the right of the company to a new and adequate hearing in respect of the assessment, will be so modified and corrected by the Federal Supreme Court on writ of error as definitely to preserve such right.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, IX. e, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — impairing contract obligations — assessing street railway for public improvement.

2. The terms and conditions in a street railway franchise which require the street railway company under certain conditions to pave or pay for paving certain portions of occupied streets do not amount to a contract which prevents, on constitutional grounds, the imposition by the municipality upon a central strip in the highway owned in fee by the street railway company of its fair share, according to benefits, of the expense of paving such street.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court of Oklahoma County, in that state, granting a writ of mandamus to compel a reassessment against the property itself instead of against a street railway company of the fair share of the expense of a pavement apportioned to a central strip in the highway owned in fee by the street railway company. of the street railway company to a hearing in respect of the assessment, and as so modified affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John B. Dudley and Henry G. Snyder argued the cause, and, with Mr. Henry E. Asp, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

In no event can any greater burden with respect to paving be imposed upon the Oklahoma Railway Company than was outlined in the franchise ordinance No. 281 of the city, where the entire duty and burden of the railway company with respect to paving are detailed. The imposition of any other or greater burden than that provided for by the franchise is void under the Federal Constitution, as impairing the obligation of the franchise contract.

Under the authority of Boise Artesian Hot & Cold Water Co. v. Boise City, 230 U. S. 84, 57 L. ed. 1400, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 997, this franchise ordinance is a grant in perpetuity. The right to occupy the street surface for tracks therefore continues while the use continues. Exactly the same is true of the private right of way, which can be used for no other purpose than the laying and operation over of street railway tracks, and which, when this use is abandoned, reverts to the grantor.

Santa Fe, L. & E. R. Co. v. Laune, — Okla. —, 168 Pac. 1022.

In no event can a greater burden be imposed upon the railway company respecting paving, in so far as its private right of way is affected, than the burden provided in the dedication of such private rights of way, such dedication being made when the land in question was farm property, not within the city limits, the area included within such dedication having been subsequently taken into the city with knowledge of the restrictions contained in the plats and dedications, such restrictions and conditions having been the inducement of the railway company to build in these outlying districts, and constituting contracts which would be impaired, in violation of both state and Federal Constitutions, by the imposition of any or other greater burden as to paving than the plats and dedications provide for and require.

In 1909 the owners platted Linwood Place, adjacent to Oklahoma City, for building lots, streets, etc. To procure extension of a street car line therein, they dedicated a strip 40 feet in width, lying along the center of what is now known as Linwood boulevard, to plaintiff in error's predecessor, "its successors and assigns, with a like effect as though deeded and conveyed to said company in fee simple by separate deed," on condition, however, that the property should be subject to reasonable police regulations, that the grantee should construct crossings over the tracks and also put down curbing and pave the crossings whenever the boulevard itself should be paved. Subordinate to above grant the streets as shown on the plat were dedicated to the public for ordinary purposes of travel. Afterwards car tracks were laid in the center of the 40-foot strip and the corporate limits of Oklahoma City were extended to include Linwood Place.

In order to provide funds for paving the public roadways along Linwood boulevard, the city undertook in 1910 to lay a tax upon the adjacent property, and directed that it be apportioned according to benefits. The board of commissioners apportioned to the central strip as its proper share of the expenses, $12,046.16. Instead of assessing this amount directly against the property, the city council erroneously assessed it against the street car company. Thereafter, the city and the Severns Company, which had put down the paving, procured from the district court of Oklahoma county a mandamus directing a reassessment against the land itself, but a hearing upon objections thereto was not specifically provided for.

The supreme court of the state (— Okla. —, 10 A.L.R. —, 170 Pac. 216) declared: "The fee title to the strip of land in question [107] here appears to be in the railway company. . . . Its right is not merely an intangible privilege or an easement, but, under the terms of the dedication, is a fee-simple title. . . . The dominion and control of the strip of land in question here is not in the city authorities. If the street should be vacated by the city authorities, this private right of way would not revert to the abutting owners, but would continue to be the property of the railway company. The company took the fee from the original grantors by the dedication before the abutting owners acquired their titles." It then held the land was subject to assessment according to benefits resulting from the paving, and "that when the commissioners proceed in obedience to the decree of the court to reassess the property of the railway company an opportunity will be given the company to be heard and to complain or object to the amount of the assessment." Nevertheless, it ordered an affirmance of the judgment of the trial court, without more, and by so doing left in serious doubt the right of plaintiff in error to a new and adequate hearing in respect of the assessment. We think, therefore, that the judgment below should be modified and corrected so as definitely to preserve such right. So modified, it is affirmed. The costs here will be equally divided.

The terms and conditions in the original franchise granted by Oklahoma City to the plaintiff in error, which require it, under given conditions, to pave or pay for paving certain portions of occupied streets, are not applicable in the circumstances here presented, and cannot be relied upon to defeat the assessment now in question. The land supposed to be benefited belongs to the company; the city has made no contract which prevents imposition upon it of a fair share of the cost of beneficial improvements. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 197 U. S. 430, 49 L. ed. 819, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466.

Modified and affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK OF SAVANNAH.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 108-120.)

Usury — by national bank.

1. The National Bank Act establishes a system of general regulations, adopting the usury laws of the states only in so far as they severally fix the rate of interest. [For other cases, see Usury, I. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Usury — by national bank — discounts — reserving interest in advance.

2. A national bank, having the power, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5136, 5197, to make discounts at the interest rate allowed by the state law, does not incur the penalty prescribed by § 5198 for taking usury merely because, in discounting short-term

Note.—As to lawfulness of taking interest in advance—see notes to Loganville Banking Co. v. Forrester, L.R.A. 1915D, 1195, and Bank of Newport v. Cook, 29 L.R.A. 761.

On forfeiture or other effect of taking or reserving illegal interest by national bank—see notes to Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Gentry, 56 L.R.A. 673, and Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 23 L. ed. U. S. 196.

notes in the ordinary course of business, it reserves interest in advance at the maximum interest rate allowed by the state law, although, under such law, interest charges reserved on a loan in advance by a state bank at the highest permitted rate constitute usury.

[For other cases, see Usury, I. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 11 and 12, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of the State of Georgia to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Superior Court of Chatham County, in that state, sustaining a demurrer to the petition in a suit to recover a penalty for usury by a national bank. Affirmed.

See same case below, 21 Ga. App. 356, 94 S. E. 611.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick T. Saussy argued the cause and filed a brief for petitioner:

We call attention to the excessive charges made by the lender, on the actual discounts charged, and the averment in the petition that the same were paid at the maturity of each loan. These most important and vital allegations were seemingly ignored by the Georgia courts, which erroneously treated the petition as merely based on an allegation that 8 per cent per annum interest, and no more, had been charged in advance, and paid at maturity.

And even if the discounts actually charged in advance had in each of the loans been exactly at the rate of 8 per cent per annum (they were at a higher rate), such charges are usurious under the laws of Georgia.

Section 5197 of U. S. Rev. Stat., Comp. Stat. § 9758, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 744, mentions "loan or discount;" and this court has held that the terms "loan" and "discount" are synonymous.

National Bank v. Johnson, 104 U. S. 271, 26 L. ed. 742; Morris v. Third Nat. Bank, 73 C. C. A. 211, 142 Fed. 25.

If the act of Congress can be construed as contended for by counsel for respondent, and as decided by the court of appeals of Georgia in this case, then a national bank in Georgia, by making the maturity of the loan sufficiently remote, can charge any rate of interest the borrower will agree to pay it.

McCall v. Herring, 116 Ga. 244, 42 S. E. 468.

The state law is adopted by Congress, and what is usury under that law, if done by a person in that state, is usury if done by a national bank located in that state; and if taking interest in advance at the highest rate is usury under the law of that state, it is usury if done by a national bank in that state.

Timberlake v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Fed. 231; Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Donnell, 195 U. S. 374, 49 L. ed. 238, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 49; Daggs v. Phœnix Nat. Bank, 177 U. S. 549, 555, 44 L. ed. 882, 884, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 732.

The suit sufficiently shows that usury was charged and paid, irrespective of the enforced deposit of over $10,000 required by the lender, and sufficiently complied with the Georgia statute relating to pleading usury. As to the enforced deposit, the suit sufficiently shows the amount of usury charged, due to the enforced deposit; for the use of the money, being worth 7 per cent, would make that amount of interest on the enforced deposit usury that was charged. Of course it was paid, because the entire discount on the full face of the loans was paid, although the borrower had no use of the enforced deposit.

The measure of the rights of the national bank to interest is the state law.

Union Nat. Bank v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 163 U. S. 330, 331, 41 L. ed. 178, 179, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1039.

The Georgia statute as to pleading the exact amount of usury charged has not been applied to any cases except where one seeks to recover or set off the usury as such, where exact figures are necessary.

Carswell v. Hartridge, 55 Ga. 415; Hollis v. Covenant Bldg. & L. Asso. 104 Ga. 322, 31 S. E. 215; King Bros. v Moore, 147 Ga. 43, 92 S. E. 757.

The enforcing of the deposit was clearly usury; it could not well be held otherwise than a usurious device; usury laws would be abrogated if the lender could require a deposit to be made as a condition to a loan; the worst forms of usury could thereby be practised, and we believe the practice has become one that is prevalent throughout our country. It is a makeshift to get more than legal interest; and while all sorts of explanations are offered for the requirement, such as maintaining the credit of the borrower with the lender, making the account worth while to carry, etc., yet it so happens that the interest charged the borrower is calculated and paid on the entire face of the note; not on the net amount loaned.

East River Bank v. Hoyt, 32 N. Y. 119.

Mr. Edward S. Elliott argued the cause, and, with Mr. Jacob Gazan, filed a brief for respondent:

The acts of Congress providing for the creation and operation of national banks are the charter of such banks, and their terms and provisions are alone applicable to national banks.

Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29–33, 23 L. ed. 196–198; Hansford v. National Bank, 10 Ga. App. 270, 73 S. E. 405.

The acts of Congress, as construed by the courts of the United States, are the law of the land, and the courts of all the states are bound, in all matters relating to the National Bank Act, to conform their opinions and decisions to the construction of that law as announced by the United States courts.

Bates v. First Nat. Bank, 111 Ga. 758, 36 S. E. 949; Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 23 L. ed. 196; Barnet v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 98 U. S. 555, 558, 25 L. ed. 212, 213; First Nat. Bank v. McEntire, 112 Ga. 232, 37 S. E. 381; Reese v. Colquitt Nat. Bank, 12 Ga. App. 472, 77 S. E. 320; First Nat. Bank v. Davis, 135 Ga. 691, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 134, 70 S. E. 246; Haseltine v. Central Nat. Bank, 183 U. S. 134, 46 L. ed. 118, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50.

Under the National Bank Act, not only by its express language, but also as construed by the United States courts, national banks are permitted to take discount at the highest legal rate authorized by the laws of the state in which such bank does business, and thus in Georgia discounting at 8 per cent does not constitute usury, although, if done by a state bank in Georgia, it would be usurious.

Under the decisions of this court, it is absolutely necessary that the amount of usurious interest paid should be alleged, in order to warrant a recovery under the provisions of § 5198 (Comp. Stat. § 9759, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 747).

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

The court below rightly construed the pleadings as presenting only one substantial Federal question:—Did [109] respondent subject itself to the penalties prescribed for taking usury by discounting short-time notes in the ordinary course of business and charging therefor at the rate of 8 per centum per annum in advance? And we think it correctly answered that question in the negative.

Respondent is a national bank. Its powers in respect of discounts, whether transactions by it are usurious, and the consequent penalties therefor, must be ascertained upon a consideration of the National Bank Act of June 3, 1864, chap. 106, 13 Stat. at L. 99, 101, 108, Rev. Stat. §§ 5133 et seq., Comp. Stat. § 9658, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 651; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 23 L. ed. 196; Barnet v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 98 U. S. 555, 558, 25 L. ed. 212, 213; Haseltine v. Central Nat. Bank, 183 U. S. 132, 134, 46 L. ed. 118, 119, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50. Section 8 declares: "That every association formed pursuant to the provisions of this act . . . may elect or appoint directors . . . and exercise under this act all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt, by receiving deposits . . ." Section 30, printed in the margin,[1] contains regulations [110] presently important in respect of usury. Among other things, it provides: "That every association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, . . ." All these provisions were carried into §§ 5136, 5197, and 5198, Revised Statutes, Comp. Stat. §§ 9661, 9758, 9759, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 654, 744, 747, set out below.[2]

[111] The National Bank Act establishes a system of general regulations. It adopts usury laws of the states only in so far as they severally fix the rate of interest. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, supra; National Bank v. Johnson, 104 U. S. 271, 26 L. ed. 742; Haseltine v. Central Nat. Bank, supra.

The Georgia Code (1910) contains the following:

"Sec. 3426.—What is lawful interest. The legal rate of interest shall remain 7 per centum per annum, where the rate per cent is not named in the contract, and any higher rate must be specified in writing, but in no event to exceed 8 per cent per annum.

"Sec. 3427.—What is usury. Usury is the reserving and taking, or contracting to reserve and take, either directly or by indirection, a greater sum for the use of money than the lawful interest."

"Sec. 3436.—Beyond 8 per cent interest forbidden. [112] It shall not be lawful for any person, company, or cor-

[1] "Sec. 30. That every association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any state a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding 7 per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same: Provided, That such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. But the purchase, discount, or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount, or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate or interest." 13 Stat. at L. 108, chap. 106.

[2] "Rev. Stat. § 5136. Upon duly making and filing articles of association and an organization certificate, the association shall become, as from the date of the execution of its organization certificate, a body corporate, and as such, and in the name designated in the organization certificate, it shall have power—

"Seventh. To exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental poration to reserve, charge, or take for any loan or advance of money, or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money, any rate of interest greater than 8 per centum per annum, either directly or indirectly by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, or by any contract or contrivance or device whatever."

Construing these sections, in Loganville Bkg. Co. v. Forrester (1915) 143 Ga. 302, L.R.A.1915D, 1195, 84 S. E. 961, the Georgia supreme court held that charges reserved in advance by a state bank at the highest permitted rate of interest on a loan, whether short or long time, constitute usury, and said (p. 305): "If the intent be to take only legal interest, a slight and trifling excess, due to mistake or inadvertence, will not taint the transaction with usury. . . . But if the purpose be to take from the money advanced, at the time of the loan, the legal maximum rate of interest, the transaction is an usurious one." Earlier opinions by the court express a different view of the same sections. In Mackenzie v. Flannery (1892) 90 Ga. 590, 599, 16 S. E. 710, it is said: "Nor can we determine, without reference to the evidence, whether the taking of 8 per cent interest in advance by way of discount was usurious. Eight per cent was legal if agreed upon in writing . . . and it is well settled that the taking of interest in advance on short loans in the usual and ordinary course of business is not usurious, if the interest reserved does not exceed the legal rate." See also Union Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Dottenheim, 107 Ga. 606, 614, 34 S. E. 217; McCall v. Herring, 116 Ga. 235, 243, 42 S. E. 468.

Petitioner maintains the loans in question would have been usurious if made in Georgia by an individual or a state bank, and that the same rule applies notwithstanding the lender happened to be a national bank. Respondent insists that the Federal act permits it to discount short-time notes, reserving interest in advance at the maximum [113] interest rate allowed by the state law,—in this instance, 8 per centum.

In Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 8 Wheat. 338, 349, 354, 5 L. ed. 631, 633, 635, the charter of the Bank of the United States inhibited it from taking interest "more than at the rate of 6 per centum," and plaintiff claimed that by deducting interest at the rate of 6 per centum from the amount of a discounted note, the bank received usury. Replying to that point, this court, through Mr. Justice Story, said: "If a transaction of this sort is to be deemed usurious, the same principle must apply with equal force to bank discounts generally, for the practice is believed to be universal; and probably few, if any, charters, contain an express provision, authorizing, powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title."

"Rev. Stat. § 5197. Any association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state, territory, or district where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any state a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such state under this title. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the state, or territory, or district, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. And the purchase, discount, or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount, or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest.

"Rev. Stat. § 5198. The taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the preceding section, when knowingly done, shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. In case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives, may recover back, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same; provided such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. [That suits, actions, and proceedings against any association under this title may be had in any circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county, or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located having jurisdiction in similar cases.]" Act Feb. 18, 1875, chap. 80, 18 Stat. at L. 320.

in terms, the deduction of the interest in advance upon making loans or discounts. It has always been supposed that an authority to discount, or make discounts, did, from the very force of the terms, necessarily include an authority to take the interest in advance. And this is not only the settled opinion among professional and commercial men, but stands approved by the soundest principles of legal construction. Indeed, we do not know in what other sense the word 'discount' is to be interpreted. Even in England, where no statute authorizes bankers to make discounts, it has been solemnly adjudged that the taking of interest in advance by bankers, upon loans, in the ordinary course of business, is not usurious." See also McCarthy v. First Nat. Bank, 223 U. S. 493, 499, 56 L. ed. 523, 525, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240.

This view has been generally adopted. Many supporting cases are collected in a note to Bank of Newport v. Cook, 29 L.R.A. 761, and in 39 Cyc. 948 et seq. "The taking of interest in advance, upon the discount of a note in the usual course of business by a banker, is not usury. This has long been settled, and is not now open for controversy." Tyler, Usury, 1872, p. 155. "That it is not [114] usury to discount commercial paper in the ordinary course of business is absolutely settled. This rule of law arose out of custom and does not depend upon statute." Webb, Usury, 1898, § 111.

Associations organized under the National Bank Act are plainly empowered to discount promissory notes in the ordinary course of business. To discount, ex vi termini, implies reservation of interest in advance; and, under the ancient and commonly accepted doctrine, when dealing with short-time paper such a reservation at the highest interest rate allowed by law is not usurious. Recognizing prevailing practice in business and the above-stated doctrine concerning usury, we think Congress intended to endow national banks with the power, which banks generally exercise, of discounting notes, reserving charges at the highest rate permitted for interest. To carry out this purpose, the National Bank Act provides that associations organized under it may reserve on any discount interest at the rate allowed by the state; and only when there is reservation at a rate greater than the one specified does the transaction become usurious.

The maximum interest rate allowed by the Georgia statute is 8 per centum. That marks the limit which a national bank there located may charge upon discounts; but its right to retain so much arises from Federal law. The latter also completely defines what constitutes the taking of usury by a national bank, referring to the state law only to determine the maximum permitted rate.

Affirmed.

Mr. Justice Pitney, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Clarke, dissenting:

I agree that in this case but one Federal question is properly presented for our consideration, and that is whether the National Bank of Savannah took usury, [115] in violation of §§ 5197 and 5198, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. §§ 9758, 9759, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 744, 747, when, in discounting short-term notes in the ordinary course of business at its banking house in the state of Georgia, it knowingly reserved in advance a discount at the rate of 8 per centum per annum, computed upon the face of such notes, when by the laws of Georgia this was not allowed to be done by state banks of issue.

I agree that this question is to be determined by the provisions of § 5197; but, so far as it depends upon ascertaining the local rate of interest, we must determine it according to the law of the state of Georgia, because the cited sections make that law the criterion. It is settled that although the consequences of acceptance of usurious interest by a national bank and the penalties to be enforced are to be determined by the provisions of the National Banking Act, the ascertainment of the rate of interest allowable is to be according to the state law. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 32, 23 L. ed. 196, 198; Union Nat. Bank v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 163 U. S. 325, 331, 41 L. ed. 177, 178, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1039; Haseltine v. Central Nat. Bank, 183 U. S. 132, 134, 46 L. ed. 118, 119, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50.

The language of § 5197 is explicit. It allows a national bank to "take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state . . . where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such state under this title. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the state, . . . the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. . . ."

[116] I regard it as clear that by "the laws of the state" is meant not merely acts of legislation, much less a particular act or section, or a particular phrase in a single section. In order to determine the point in controversy we must take all applicable provisions of the statutes as interpreted and construed by the decisions of the court of last resort, and from their combined effect determine what is "interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state."

The pertinent statute law of the state of Georgia is found in §§ 3426, 3427, and 3436 of the Code. The first of these defines "what is lawful interest," and prescribes 7 per centum per annum as the legal rate where no rate is named in the contract, and permits a higher rate to be specified in writing, "but in no event to exceed 8 per cent per annum." Section 3427 defines usury as "reserving and taking, or contracting to reserve and take, either directly or by indirection, a greater sum for the use of money than the lawful interest." And § 3436 declares: "It shall not be lawful for any person, company, or corporation to reserve, charge, or take for any loan or advance of money, or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money, any rate of interest greater than 8 per centum per annum, either directly or indirectly by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, or by any contract or contrivance or device whatever."

I agree that under the decisions of this court and the general current of authority, the discounting of short-term notes with a reservation of interest in advance at the highest rate allowed by statute is permissible in the absence of special restriction. Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 8 Wheat. 338, 349, 354, 5 L. ed. 631, 633, 635.

And I understand it to have been permitted in Georgia prior to the recent decision by the supreme court of that state in Loganville Bkg. Co. v. Forrester, 143 [117] Ga. 302, L.R.A.1915D, 1195, 84 S. E. 961. See Mackenzie v. Flannery, 90 Ga. 590, 599, 16 S. E. 710; Union Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Dottenheim, 107 Ga. 606, 614, 34 S. E. 217; McCall v. Herring, 116 Ga. 235, 243, 42 S. E. 468.

The Forrester Case was decided April 13, 1915. The claim involved in the present suit includes a series of transactions, the first of which was on November 2, 1914, the last on October 18, 1915. A majority of these were prior to the decision in the Forrester Case; and as to them I agree that there was no violation of the Federal statute.

With respect to the others, I have reached a different conclusion. The case was decided on a demurrer to plaintiff's petition, in which it was alleged that defendant (now respondent) knowingly received and charged interest in excess of the highest contractual rate allowed under the laws of the state, specifying the particular dates and amounts. This necessarily imports a knowledge at the time of each transaction as to what then constituted the law of the state, supposing such knowledge need be averred.

As to these later transactions, with great respect for the views of my brethren, I am constrained to dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court because convinced that there is error in holding without qualification that, since the decision of the Forrester Case, 8 per cent is the rate of interest allowed and limited for state banks of issue by the laws of the state of Georgia. It seems to me erroneous to regard that decision as merely defining usury and thus settling what lawfully may be done by state banks in respect of taking interest in advance, and to ignore its effect, in combination with the quoted sections of the Code, as constituting the law of the state which fixes the maximum rate of interest for such banks, and therefore, under § 5197, United States Rev. Stat., establishes the limit for national banks located in that state. Plainly, I think, the purpose of Congress was [118] to place national banks upon a precise equality in this respect with banks of issue organized under state laws, and that where the local law places a higher or a lower limit upon such banks of issue than upon other lenders of money the same limit should be imposed upon the national banks.

The section has regard to substance, not merely to form; and in determining what is in substance the local rate of interest it is fallacious, I submit, to regard the multiplier only (say, 8 per cent) and ignore the multiplicand, since both factors have equal influence in producing the result. As in other cases of testing state laws by a Federal standard, the question is, What is the effect and operation of those laws, as construed and applied by the state court of last resort?

The difference between the effect of computing discount taken in advance according to the custom of bankers, by applying the allowed percentage to the face of the note,—termed "bank discount,"—and the effect of deducting an amount equivalent to exact interest on the sum actually loaned,—termed "true discount,"—is very substantial, and is recognized in the standard interest and discount tables, which contain computations on both bases. To illustrate by a comparison: If interest at the rate of 8 per centum per annum be reserved in advance and computed upon the face of a three months' note, it amounts to 2.040^8 per cent for the period, or at the rate of 8.1632 per centum per annum upon the money loaned; upon a six months' note it amounts to 4.1667 per cent for the period, or at the rate of 8.3333 per centum per annum; upon a nine months' note, to 6.383 per cent for the period, or at the rate of 8.511 per centum per annum; upon a one-year note it amounts to 8.695 per cent.

The legal problem is precisely analogous to that involved in comparing respective burdens of taxation imposed upon different properties or classes of property; [119] concerning which this court has more than once held that a law requiring that one class shall be taxed at the "same rate of taxation" paid by another requires that not only the percentage of the rate, but the basis of the valuation, shall be the same. Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 158, 162, 163, 25 L. ed. 903, 905–907; Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. 244 U. S. 499, 515, 61 L. ed. 1280, 1288, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88.

The laws of Georgia do not prohibit the taking of interest in advance by a state bank; and they permit it to be charged according to the usual course of banking, with this qualification: that if reserved in advance at the highest percentage, or at any percentage that has the effect of yielding to the lender more than at the rate of 8 per centum per annum upon the amount actually loaned, it is usurious. This qualification, which, since the decision of the Forrester Case, must be deemed to be the law of Georgia, has precisely the same effect as if it had been inserted by way of an amending proviso to § 3426 of the Code. That it happens to arise from the construction and application of that section together with §§ 3427 and 3436 by the state court of last resort can make no difference for present purposes.

The case before us comes squarely within the principle of Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Donnell, 195 U. S. 369, 373, 374, 49 L. ed. 238, 241, 242, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 49. There the question was whether a national bank in Missouri had taken usury contrary to §§ 5197 and 5198, U. S. Rev. Stat., Comp. Stat. §§ 9758, 9759, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 744, 747, in taking interest computed at a percentage less than the highest rate allowed by the state law if agreed upon in writing, but at the same time violating a state prohibition against compounding interest oftener than once a year. This court held that the prohibition against frequent compounding affected the "rate of interest" within the meaning of those words in § 5198, and that this section was violated because the local prohibition was violated. I quote from the opinion (p. 374): "The rate of interest which a man receives is greater when [120] he is allowed to compound than when he is not, the other elements in the case being the same. Even if the compounded interest is less than might be charged directly without compounding, a statute may forbid enlarging the rate in that way, whatever may be the rules of the common law. The supreme court of Missouri holds that that is what the Missouri statute has done. On that point, and on the question whether what was done amounted to compounding within the meaning of the Missouri statute, we follow the state court. Union Nat. Bank v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 163 U. S. 325, 331, 41 L. ed. 177, 178, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1039. Therefore, since the interest charged and received by the plaintiff was compounded more than once a year, it was at a rate greater than was allowed by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5197, and it was forfeited."

For these reasons I am convinced that the respondent national bank, in knowingly discounting notes and reserving interest at the rate of 8 per centum per annum upon the face of the notes, in violation of the limitation imposed by the quoted sections of the Georgia Code as construed by the supreme court of that state in the Forrester Case, charged more than "interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state," and that therefore the judgment in its favor ought to be reversed.

NELLIE VEASEY,[1] Administratrix of the Succession of Thomas Veasey, Deceased.

Admiralty — exclusiveness of Federal jurisdiction — state Workmen's Compensation Laws.

1. A state Workmen's Compensation Law may not be applied to an injury sustained prior to the enactment of the Act of October 6, 1917, by a longshoreman while he was unloading a vessel lying in navigable waters, in view of the Judicial Code, §§ 24 and 256, giving Federal district courts exclusive judicial cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right to a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it.

[For other cases, see Admiralty, I. b, 8, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Admiralty — exclusiveness of Federal jurisdiction — state Workmen's Compensation Act — saving clause — retroactive effect.

2. A cause of action accruing before the enactment of the Act of October 6, 1917, is not affected by the provision of that act which amends the clauses of the Judicial Code, §§ 24 and 256, giving Federal district courts exclusive judicial cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law was competent to give it, by adding the words, "and to claimants the rights and remedies under the Workmen's Compensation Law of any state."

Argued and submitted November 14, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a judgment which, on a rehearing, affirmed a judgment of the Civil District Court of the Parish of Orleans, in that state, in favor of plaintiff in a suit under the state Workmen's Compensation Act. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 142 La. 1012, 77 So. 948.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

[1] Death of Thomas Veasey, the defendant in error herein, suggested, and appearance of Nellie Veasey, as administratrix of the succession of Thomas Veasey, deceased, as the party defendant in error herein, filed and entered November 10, 1919, on motion of counsel for the defendant in error.

Mr. George Janvier argued the cause, and, with Messrs. William C. Dufour, Gustave Lemle, A. A. Moreno, and John St. Paul, Jr., filed a brief for plaintiffs in error:

The remedy of the Louisiana Workmen's Compensation Act (it provides compensation upon a prescribed scale for injuries and deaths of employees, without regard to fault) is a remedy unknown to the common law, and incapable of enforcement by the ordinary processes of any court; and hence, prior to the amendment of October 6, 1917, to the Judicial Code, was not among the common-law remedies which are saved to suitors from the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction by the Judiciary Act of 1879, § 9.

Southern P. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 207, 61 L. ed. 1086, L.R.A.1918C, 451, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 900, 14 N. C. C. A. 596.

Work performed by a stevedore on board a ship unloading at a wharf in navigable waters is maritime; his employment for such work and injuries suffered in it are likewise maritime, and the rights and liabilities arising from such work, employment, and injuries are clearly within the admiralty jurisdiction.

Ibid.

If a cause is maritime in nature admiralty is not deprived of the jurisdiction by the fact that the suit is one in personam, and not in rem.

The amendment adopted October 6, 1917, to §§ 24 and 256 of the Judicial Code, is not retroactive.

Mr. Walter S. Penfield submitted the cause for defendant in error. Messrs. Solomon Wolff, E. M. Stafford, F. B. Freeland, and Howell Carter, Jr., were on the brief:

A contract by which a stevedore employs a longshoreman, and, in the course of this employment, sends the longshoreman aboard a vessel to assist in loading her, is not maritime in its nature, especially where, as in the instant case, there is no allegation in the petition that the accident was caused by some negligence of the vessel, its owner, officers, or crew.

Campbell v. H. Hackfeld & Co. 62 C. C. A. 274, 125 Fed. 696.

The employment of the longshoreman may have been as well for work on shore as for work on the vessel, and admiralty is without jurisdiction where even a clearly maritime contract is so inseparably connected with a contract which is not maritime in its nature, that one cannot be decided without the other.

Turner v. Beacham, Taney, 583, Fed. Cas. No. 14,252.

Admiralty has no jurisdiction over preliminary contracts leading to maritime contracts, irrespective of the name given them.

The Tribune, 3 Sumn. 144, Fed. Cas. No. 14,171.

The nature and character of the contract of service decide whether they are within the jurisdiction of admiralty, and not the place of performance, whether on land or on water.

Wortman v. Griffith, 3 Blatchf. 528, Fed. Cas. No. 18,057.

It is error to contend that the place of injury controls the rights of men. That merely because one is injured on board a vessel, admiralty alone affords relief. It is not the place where the accident happened—it is the original contract of employment which determines.

Northern Pacific S. S. Co. v. Hall Bros. Marine R. & Shipbuilding Co. 249 U. S. 119, 63 L. ed. 510, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221.

Even if the courts of Louisiana were, before the amendment of the Judicial Code, without jurisdiction to entertain the claim of the defendant in error, yet where, by a change in the law, they became seised of jurisdiction to entertain it, they could decide the case, if it was still pending undecided after jurisdiction was acquired.

Simmons v. Hanover, 23 Pick. 188; Bass v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 136 La. 528, 67 So. 355; Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 138 La. 377, P.U.R.1916B, 356, 70 So. 332.

Where no remedy exists for an injury in the admiralty courts, the fact that such courts exist and exercise jurisdiction in other causes of action leaves the state courts as free to exercise jurisdiction in respect to an injury not cognizable in the admiralty, as if the admiralty courts were unknown to the Constitution, and had no existence in our jurisprudence.

American S. B. Co. v. Chase, 16 Wall. 522, 21 L. ed. 369.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Law of Louisiana (No. 20, La. Acts 1914), the supreme court of that state affirmed a judgment against plaintiffs in error and in favor of Veasey, who claimed to have suffered injuries, August 6, 1915, while employed by Henry [122] and Eugene Peters as a longshoreman on board the "Seria," then lying at New Orleans. The steamer was being unloaded. While upon her and engaged in that work, Veasey accidentally fell through a hatchway. 142 La. 1012, 77 So. 948.

A compensation policy in favor of Peters, issued by the Ætna Life Insurance Company, was in force when the accident occurred.

The work in which defendant in error was engaged is maritime in its nature; his employment was a maritime contract; the injuries which he received were likewise maritime; and the rights and liabilities of the parties in connection therewith were matters clearly within the admiralty jurisdiction. In such circumstances, the Workmen's Compensation Law of the state had no application when the accident occurred. Atlantic Transport Co. v. Imbrovek, 234 U. S. 52, 59, 61, 58 L. ed. 1208, 1211, 1212, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1157, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733; Southern P. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 217, 218, 61 L. ed. 1086, 1099, L.R.A.1918C, 451, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 900, 14 N. C. C. A. 596.

Clause third, § 24, of the Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1091, chap. 231], confers upon the district courts of the United States jurisdiction "of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." Clause third, § 256, provides that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States shall be exclusive in "all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." By an act approved October 6, 1917, chap. 97, 40 Stat. at L. 395, Comp. Stat. §§ 991(3), 1233, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 401, 414, Congress directed that both of these clauses be amended by inserting after "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it," the words "and to claimants the rights and remedies under the Workmen's Compensation Law of any state." The court below erroneously concluded that this act should be given retroactive effect and applied in the [123] present controversy. There is nothing in the language employed, nor is there any circumstance known to us, which indicates a purpose to make the act applicable when the cause of action arose before its passage; and we think it must not be so construed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, & HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — weighing.

1. Payments to a railway company for carrying the mails during each four-year term upon the basis of weights taken immediately prior to the beginning of such term instead of annually must be deemed to satisfy the requirement of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4002, that payment of specified sums per mile be made per annum according to weights, since such action accords with prior practice followed for many years, and was permitted by the letter of the statute, the carrier having submitted with full knowledge.

Postoffice — carrying mails — duty of railway carrier.

2. Prior to the Act of July 28, 1916, railroads—with the exception of certain roads aided by land grants—were not required by law to carry the mails.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — compulsion — implied contract.

3. A railway company which voluntarily accepts and performs mail transportation service, with knowledge of what the United States intends to pay, cannot recover any greater compensation, even though it might have been driven to perform the service for an inadequate compensation by the fear that a refusal would incur the hostility of persons living along its line, since this does not amount to compulsion by the United States, and cannot constitute the basis of a justiciable claim against it for taking property for public use under an implied contract to make adequate compensation.

Argued May 2, 1919. Decided December 8, 1919.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment dismissing on demurrer a petition claiming increased compensation for carrying the mails. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 222.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward G. Buckland and S. S. Ashbaugh argued the cause, and, with Mr. Arthur P. Russell, filed a brief for appellant:

Carrying the mails is compulsory when this service is called for under the law by the Postmaster General.

Rep. 320; Chicago, M. & St. P.

R. Co. v. United States, 198 U. S. 385, 49 L. ed. 1094, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665.

The claimant has not by performance waived any right to demand pay for the true weight of mail carried each year. The statute cannot be waived.

Union P. R. Co. v. United States, 104 U. S. 664, 26 L. ed. 885.

It cannot be held that parcel post packages can be added after July 1, 1913, to the amount of mail carried by claimant, as ascertained by a weighing in the fall of 1912. This new matter taken from freight and express cannot be added by virtue of the words "subject to future orders," as found in the notice of adjustment dated November 13, 1913, so as to bring it within the decision in Eastern R. Co. v. United States, 129 U. S. 391, 32 L. ed. 730, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 320.

Assistant Attorney General Brown argued the cause and filed a brief for appellee:

This case is another of a long series which have arisen from the efforts of the railroad companies to secure increased compensation for carrying the mails, and in which it has been sought by one argument or another to escape the limitations of the Statute of 1873 and its amendments, and the effect of the practice which grew up under it. It would serve no useful purpose to review or even to list all of these cases, but it is interesting to notice that the point of compulsion here relied upon was involved in the following cases decided by this court:

Union P. R. Co. v. United States, 104 U. S. 662, 665, 26 L. ed. 884, 885; Eastern R. Co. v. United States, 129 U. S. 391, 32 L. ed. 730, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 320; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. United States, 198 U. S. 385, 389, 49 L. ed. 1094, 1095, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 56 L. ed. 1236, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. United States, 249 U. S. 385, 63 L. ed. 659, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 348.

The appellant voluntarily performed the service.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 56 L. ed. 1236, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702; Eastern R. Co. v. United States, 129 U. S. 391, 32 L. ed. 730, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 320; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. United States, supra.

A promise will not be held to be implied in fact which is contrary to the expressed intention of the parties.

Earle v. Coburn, 130 Mass. 596; Columbus, H. V. & T. R. Co. v. Gaffney, 65 Ohio St. 104, 61 N. E. 152; Municipal Waterworks Co. v. Ft. Smith, 216 Fed. 431.

The question being merely one of the meaning of the statute, there is a plain case for the application of the familiar rule as to the acceptance of long-continued departmental construction, not itself plainly erroneous, and impliedly sanctioned by the re-enactment of the statute.

New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 200 U. S. 361, 401, 50 L. ed. 515, 525, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant sued the United States to recover the difference between amounts received through the Postoffice Department and what it claims should have been paid for its services in carrying the mails during a series of years, ending June 30, 1914. The demand is based upon implied contracts alleged to arise from the following circumstances: First. Acceptance and transportation of the mails in reliance upon § 4002, Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat. § 7483, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 195), as amended. This directs payment of specified sums per mile per annum according to weights; and the claim is that because the Postoffice Department improperly construed and applied it, appellant received much less than it should have. Second. Acceptance and transportation of the mails under orders and coercion of the Postoffice Department, followed by failure to allow reasonable compensation therefor. Appellant claims its property was taken for public use and adequate compensation must be paid.

Concerning the challenged interpretation and application of § 4002, Revised Statutes, resulting in payments during each four-year term upon the basis of weights taken [127] immediately prior to the beginning of the same instead of annually, it suffices to say that the action taken accords with prior practice followed for many years; the letter of the statute permits it; the carrier submitted with full knowledge; and, impliedly, at least, it was sanctioned by this court in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. United States, 249 U. S. 385, 63 L. ed. 659, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 348.

We think it must be treated as settled doctrine that, prior to the Act of July 28, 1916, chap. 261, 39 Stat. at L. 412, 429,—with the exception of certain roads aided by land grants,—railroads were not required by law to carry the mails. Eastern R. Co. v. United States, 129 U. S. 391, 394, 32 L. ed. 730, 731, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 320; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 650, 56 L. ed. 1236, 1239, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. United States, supra. And as appellant voluntarily accepted and performed the service with knowledge of what the United States intended to pay, it cannot now claim an implied contract for a greater sum. It may be that any railroad, by failing to carry the mails, would incur the hostility of those living along its lines, and as a consequence suffer serious financial losses; but the fear of such results certainly does not amount to compulsion by the United States, and cannot constitute the basis of a justiciable claim against them for taking property.

The Court of Claims (53 Ct. Cl. 222) dismissed the petition upon demurrer, and its judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Brandeis dissents.

[128] UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF OSAGE COUNTY, OKLAHOMA, et al.

Indians — status — United States as guardian — exhausting power.

1. The United States did not exhaust its power as the protector and guardian of the Osage Indians, by the enactment of the provisions of the Act of June 28, 1906, for the division of the Indian property, so as no longer to have as to them any mission or authority.

[For other cases, see Indians, I. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

United States — suit by Federal officers — illegal taxation of Indian lands.

2. Notwithstanding the subjection to state taxation of the surplus lands of the noncompetent Osage Indians which was effected by the Act of June 28, 1906, authority exists in the officers of the United States to invoke judicial relief against the enforcement of state tax assessments against such lands which are asserted to be based upon systematic, arbitrary, grossly excessive, discriminatory, and unfair valuations which amount to a perversion of the state laws, committed in order to defeat the property rights conferred by the Federal statute.

[For other cases, see United States, IV. a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Injunction — illegal taxation — multiplicity of suits — remedy at law.

3. The remedies afforded to individuals under the state law to correct errors in assessing taxes do not defeat the right of the United States, through its officers, to invoke equitable relief against the enforcement of state tax assessments on the surplus lands of noncompetent Osage Indians which are asserted to be based upon systematic, arbitrary, grossly excessive, discriminatory, and unfair valuations which amount to a perversion of the state laws, committed in order to defeat the property rights conferred by the Act of June 28, 1906, since the interposition of a court of equity to prevent the wrong complained of was essential in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits, and, in addition, such wrong was not a mere mistake or error committed in the enforcement of the state tax laws.

[For other cases, see Injunction, I. k, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Although the subject was fully stated in McCurdy v. United States, 246 U. S. 263, 62 L. ed. 706, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289, nevertheless, to throw light on this case, we recall the facts concerning the distribution of the land and funds of the Osage Tribe of Indians, made under the Act of Congress of June 28, 1906, 34 Stat. at L. 539, chap. 3572.

Of the tribal land there were reserved from allotment certain parcels, some of which were used by the United States or the tribe and others of which were used by individuals for the benefit of the tribe. From the remainder, each member was allotted three tracts of 160 acres each, of which one was to be designated and held as a homestead. Any land which remained was also to be allotted. The funds in trust in the hands of the United States were divided pro rata, to be held subject to the supervision of the United States. The oil, gas, coal, and other mineral rights in all the lands were reserved for the benefit of the tribe. The tract selected as a homestead was made inalienable and nontaxable, subject to the action of Congress. The land embraced by other than the homestead allotment, called surplus land, was made inalienable for a period of twenty-five years and nontaxable for three, subject to the action of Congress. Power was conferred, however, on the Secretary of the Interior, to give to the allottee a certificate of competency, upon receipt of which the surplus land held by such an allottee became immediately alienable and taxable.

In September, 1917, the United States district attorney for the district of Oklahoma, by direction of the Attorney General, commenced this suit in the name of the United States, for the benefit of named noncompetent members of the Osage Tribe and of all other members [130] in the same situation, to prevent the enforcement of state and local taxes assessed against the surplus, although taxable, lands of said Indians for the eight years between 1910 and 1917, inclusive.

The defendants were the Board of County Commissioners of Osage County, including the county clerk and county treasurer, officials charged by the laws of the state with the enforcement of the taxes which were assailed. After averring the existence of authority in the United States, in virtue of its guardianship of the Indians, and as a result of the terms of the Allotment Act, to protect and safeguard the interests of the Indians from the enforcement of the illegal taxes complained of, the bill charged that the taxes in issue were "arbitrary, grossly excessive, discriminatory, and unfair, and were made in violation of the rights of the said Osage Indians guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the state of Oklahoma; . . . that the State Board of Equalization arbitrarily and systematically increased the assessments on such Indian lands for the year 1911 to an amount approximately nearly double the original amount of such assessments. . . ." It was averred that the tax assessments made on the Indian lands involved "were made without an inspection or examination of the land . . . that the said appraisers in making such appraisements discriminated against the lands of the Osage Indians as a class and systematically overvalued the same and systematically undervalued other property in said county; . . . that the assessments so made by said assessors were made in such an arbitrary and capricious manner as to amount to constructive fraud upon the taxpayers, and that the overvaluations made by said assessors were so grossly excessive as to justify the interference of a court of equity; . . ." It was alleged that the assessments complained of were of such a character that the [131] Secretary of the Interior had endeavored to have them corrected, but without result; that, in consequence of his having called the attention of Congress to the subject, the Act of March 2, 1917 [39 Stat. at L. 983, chap. 146], was passed, authorizing an appraisement by the said Secretary for the purpose of fixing the extent of the overassessment, and that such appraisement, which had been virtually completed, sustained the charges set forth in the bill.

There was annexed to the bill a statement of the result of the appraisement in thirty-six cases as compared with the assessments complained of. In one case it was alleged that the land of the Indian was assessed at $20 an acre, although by the affidavit of the county clerk it was shown that it was worth $3 per acre. In another case it was alleged that, for the purpose of taxation, the land was shown to be overvalued by 119 per cent. It was further averred that an offer had been made through the Secretary of the Interior to pay all the taxes assessed for all the years assailed upon the basis of the assessment made as the result of the act of Congress, but that the same had been refused, and that process for the sale of the lands for delinquent taxes was immediately threatened. The prayer was for relief by injunction as against the illegal assessments and for action by the court, looking to a payment of all delinquent taxes due by noncompetent Osage Indians on the basis of the appraisement made under the act of Congress.

On motion the court dismissed the bill on the ground "that the lands involved were by the act of Congress, approved June 28, 1906, declared subject to taxation, and that the plaintiff has no interest in said lands, and has no duty or authority to contest the taxes thereof, or the sale of said lands for unpaid taxes, . . ." On appeal the decree was affirmed on the ground that, as the state law afforded adequate means to the United States and the noncompetent Indians to correct errors in assessing [132] taxes, if any, there was no basis for invoking relief from a court of equity.

The argument here is exclusively directed to two grounds: the one enforced by the trial court and the other sustained by the court below. The first, however, is in argument here expanded into two points of view, since it challenges not only the authority of the officers of the United States to bring the suit, but the power of the United States to authorize them to do it. So far as the latter aspect is concerned, it proceeds upon the assumption that, by the Act of 1906, the United States exhausted its power as the protector and guardian of the Osage Indians, and as to them had no longer any mission or authority whatever. We pass from this contention without further notice, as it is so obviously opposed to the doctrine upon the subject settled from the beginning, and so in conflict with the terms of the act of Congress, that nothing more need to be said concerning it. As to the first point of view, the proposition is this: That as the Act of 1906 subjected the surplus lands to taxation, it therefore brought them under the taxing laws of the state; and, it is insisted, that having been so brought, it results that until Congress otherwise provides, there exists no lawful authority in an officer of the United States to act in the name of the United States for the purpose of attacking the legality of a tax levied upon said lands under the laws of the state. But although the premise upon which the argument proceeds be admitted, that is, that in subjecting the lands to state taxation it was the purpose of Congress to subject them to the methods of levying and collecting the taxes provided by state law, including the remedial processes for the correction of errors, we fail to understand what relation that concession can have to the case in hand, since, on the face of the pleadings, the action taken by the United States was not to frustrate the act of Congress by preventing the operation of the state [133] law, but to prevent the systematic violation of the state law, committed for the purpose of destroying the rights created by the act of Congress. The argument therefore disregards the foundation for the relief sought, and proceeds upon the assumption that the exertion of power to prevent a perversion of state laws made to defeat the rights which the act of Congress gave is to be treated as a violation of the act of Congress and a refusal to apply the state law.

Certain is it that as the United States, as guardian of the Indians, had the duty to protect them from spoliation, and, therefore, the right to prevent their being illegally deprived of the property rights conferred under the Act of Congress of 1906, the power existed in the officers of the United States to invoke relief for the accomplishment of the purpose stated. Indeed, the Act of Congress of 1917, providing for the appraisement of the lands in question, by necessary implication, if not in express terms, treated the power of the officers of the United States to resist the illegal assessments as undoubted.

And the existence of power in the United States to sue which is thus established disposes of the proposition that, because of remedies afforded to individuals under the state law, the authority of a court of equity could not be invoked by the United States. This necessarily follows because, in the first place, as the authority of the United States extended to all the noncompetent members of the tribe, it obviously resulted that the interposition of a court of equity to prevent the wrong complained of was essential in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits (see Union P. R. Co. v. Cheyenne (Union P. R. Co. v. Ryan) 113 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 1098, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 601; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 517, 42 L. ed. 819, 838, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Cruickshank v. Bidwell, 176 U. S. 73, 81, 44 L. ed. 377, 381, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280; Boise Artesian Hot & Cold Water Co. v. Boise City, 213 U. S. 276, 283, 53 L. ed. 796, 798, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426; Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. 244 U. S. 499, 506, 61 L. ed. 1280, 1285, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88); in the second place, because, as the wrong relied upon was not a mere mistake or error [134] committed in the enforcement of the state tax laws, but a systematic and intentional disregard of such laws by the state officers for the purpose of destroying the rights of the whole class of noncompetent Indians who were subject to the protection of the United States, it follows that such class wrong and disregard of the state statute gave rise to the right to invoke the interposition of a court of equity in order that an adequate remedy might be afforded (Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903; Regan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 390, 38 L. ed. 1014, 1021, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114; Coulter v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 196 U. S. 599, 49 L. ed. 615, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342; Raymond v. Chicago Union Traction Co. 207 U. S. 20, 52 L. ed. 78, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, 12 Ann. Cas. 757; Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. 244 U. S. 499, 507, 61 L. ed. 1280, 1285, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88). In fact, the subject is fully covered by the ruling in Union P. R. Co. v. Weld County, 247 U. S. 282, 62 L. ed. 1110, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510.

Reversed and remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Patents — novelty — foreign publication.

1. Patentable novelty cannot be asserted for a device which has been described in foreign printed publications.

[For other cases, see Patents, V. d, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Patents — novelty — anticipation — infringement.

2. In view of the prior art, the only originality that can be accorded to the Bone patent, number 705,732, for a steel reinforced concrete retaining wall with a heel and toe at the base, so constructed that the weight of the retaining material upon the heel of the inclosed metal structure will operate to retain the wall in a vertical position, is in its special form, and there can be no infringement except by a copy of that form or a colorable imitation of it.

The courts have not looked with much favor upon the patents granted for concrete constructions reinforced by bars, as will appear from the following list of cases. Some workers in this art, and for a time the Patent Office Examiner, seemed to have gone wild in the matter of patents for reinforced concrete constructions consisting chiefly in locating reinforcing bars at points needing reinforcing. Thus, Mr. Luten, one of Mr. Bone's experts in our case, testifies that he applied for about eighty patents on reinforced concrete constructions, and had received about forty-two patents. Several of these got into the courts, as will appear from the decisions below, and have been uniformly held void for lack of invention. These

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit brought in the district court of the United States for the district of Indiana to restrain the infringement of a patent for a retaining wall, which, to quote petitioner, is "a wall to prevent the material of an embankment or cut from sliding."

After issue joined and proofs submitted, the district court (Anderson, J.) entered a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity. The decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, to review which action this writ of certiorari was granted.

The bill in the case is in the conventional form and alleges invention, the issue of a patent numbered 705,732, and infringement by respondent. The prayer is for treble damages, an injunction and accounting.

The answer of respondent is a serial denial of the allegations of the bill, and avers anticipation of petitioner's device by prior patents and publications in this and other countries.

This summary of the issues is enough for our purpose, and we need only add preliminarily to their discussion that Bone's device has the sanction of a patent and a decision sustaining it by the district court for the northern district of Ohio and the circuit court of appeals for the [136] sixth circuit. The difference of decision in that circuit and the seventh circuit is an important consideration and must be accounted for, which is best done by a display of the patent and the case.

First as to the patent: It describes the invention as being one that "relates to improvements in retaining walls for abutments to bridges . . . , and such places as it is desired to retain earth or other matter permanently in place with its face at an angle nearer vertical than it would naturally repose when exposed to the action of the elements or gravity;" and "consists principally of introducing into masonry of concrete, stone, or brick a framework of steel or iron in such way that the whole wall is so much strengthened thereby that the volume of the masonry may be greatly reduced, and yet the height, base, and strength against overturning, bulging, or settling will still be ample."

The following figure represents a cross-sectional view of the device—A representing the masonry, B the material retained, and B^1 the earth on which the wall rests. The metal parts within A are indicated by the smaller letters.

. [137] The patent does not insist upon that form of the masonry in all particulars. The base of the wall may be, it is said, "varied to suit the circumstances;" it, the base, may extend to

The utility of the wall of these shapes is represented to be that it is "not so liable to be overturned from the pressure of material behind it as would be a wall of the same height and area of section, but having a rectangular, trapezoidal, or triangular shaped section," the latter shapes requiring more masonry. And it is said that the patented wall, "having more base and less weight" than such other shapes, "will rest more securely on a soft or yielding foundation, the weight of the material resting on the heel" causing the latter "to press on the earth below, and thus cause friction to prevent the whole wall from sliding outward." This is the especial effect of the patent, achieved by the wall of the shape described, and distinguishes it, is the contention, from the retaining walls of the prior art.

The patentee admits, however, that retaining walls had been "constructed of concrete and steel, but none" to his "knowledge" "had been supported on their own base as" his, nor had "any of them entirely inclosed the steel within the concrete" nor had "any of them used the weight of the material retained as a force to retain itself."

Such, then, is the wall and the utility attributed to it. The combinations which may be made with it are set forth in 17 claims, of which 1, 3, 5, 16, and 17 are involved in the present action. Counsel for petitioner considers, however, that 1 and 17 are so far illustrative that the others need not be given. They are as follows:

"1. The combination with a retaining wall having a [138] heel, of a metal structure embedded vertically in said wall and obliquely in said heel, so that the weight of the retained material upon the heel of the metal structure will operate to retain the wall in vertical position.

"17. The combination with a retaining wall having an inclined heel and a toe at opposite sides thereof, of a metal structure embedded within said wall and heel, said structure consisting of upright bents at the back part of the vertical wall and continuing down along the upper part of the heel of said wall to the back part thereof, whereby by reason of the toe and the heel the weight of the retained material upon the heel of the metal structure will operate to maintain the wall in a vertical position."

So much for the device of the patent. How far was it new or how far was it anticipated?

Bone's idea was conceived in 1898, and his patent issued in 1902 upon an application made in 1899; but, according to his counsel, the value of the invention was not recognized "until after the lapse of several years," when he, Bone, brought a suit against the city of Akron, Ohio, in the district court for the northern district of Ohio, in vindication of the patent and in reparation for its infringement. He was given a decree which was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit.

The district court (Judge Day) gave a clear exposition of the patent, the relation of its metal parts[1] to the masonry [139] parts, and their co-operating functions, and adjudged the patent valid and the wall of the city of Akron an infringement of it.

The circuit court of appeals affirmed the decree. The court said that the record disclosed nothing which anticipated "the substantial thought of the

[1] The following is an extract from Judge Day's opinion:

"The reinforcing members [metallic members] are placed near the back face of the wall and heel and near the lower face of the toe. The oblique reinforcing bars in the heel acting in conjunction with the uprights serve the function of a cantilever beam whereby the weight of the material pressing upon the heel is transferred to the upright portion of the wall and operates to retain the wall in a vertical position. . . .

"Considering the claims of the patent, and the testimony, I am of the opinion that patent." If it had done so, or, to quote the exact language of the court, "If the prior art had shown a structure intended for a retaining wall, and having a heel such that the weight of the earth thereon would tend to keep the wall erect, it might be difficult to find invention in merely adding the form of reinforcement most suitable to create the desired tensile strength; but we find no such earlier structures."[2]

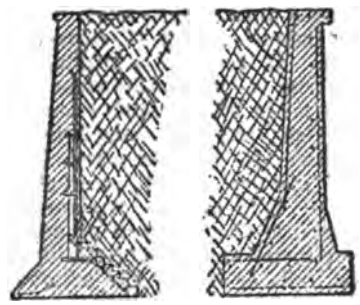
[140] On application for rehearing the court refused to direct the district court to open the case to permit the defendant to put in proof regarding a German publication of 1894.

Those decisions confronted the district court in the present suit and fortified the pretensions of the patent. They were attacked, however, as having been pronounced upon a different record, and this conclusion was accepted by the district court. The latter court found from the new evidence the existence of a structure upon the nonexistence of which the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit based its conclusion. The district court said that Bone was not the first to do the things he asserted he was the first to do, and that whatever the record in the sixth circuit might have shown, so far as the record before the court "was concerned, the absolute converse of that proposition" had "been demonstrated."

The court, therefore, as we have said, dismissed the bill for want of equity.

The decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals; indeed, the reasoning of the district court was approved after painstaking consideration of the patent and an estimate of the anticipatory defenses, none of which, the court said, was introduced in the Akron Case, "otherwise a different conclusion would have been reached," adducing the opinion of the court. 161 C. C. A. 247, 249 Fed. 214. This being so, and there is no doubt it is so, the present case is relieved of the authority or persuasion of the Akron Case, and it becomes necessary to consider the prior art and decide the extent and effect of its anticipation.

We have given a cross section of the device of the [141] patent, showing its shape and strengthening "metallic members," and the patent informs of their co-operative function. We reproduce the device and set by its side the Marion county wall for comparison.



BONE MARION COUNTY

If we may assign novelty to the Bone wall and consider it a broad advance

Bone, the patentee, was the first to reinforce the retaining wall, or similar wall of concrete or masonry in such a manner that the weight of the retained material would be utilized to impart through the reinforcing members tensile resistance to the stern or vertical part of the wall, thereby fortifying this part of the wall against breaking strains.

"This was an advancement in the art and possessed novelty, and the structure of the defendant city infringed this patent.

"While many of the features of concrete structures were old, yet this combination as outlined and described in this Bone application for a patent was new. It is also in evidence that there has been a large sale and general acquiescence in the Bone patent."

[2] The following is an extract from the opinion of the circuit court of appeals:

"The record discloses nothing anticipating the substantial thought of the patent. Masonry or concrete retaining walls were deep and heavy, and maintained by gravity in their resistance against a horizontal stress. There was no occasion for reinforcement. Sustaining walls had been built of concrete with vertical reinforcement; but they were maintained against side strain by crossties or beams, without which they might tip over. If the prior art had shown a structure intended for a retaining wall, and having a heel such that the weight of the earth thereon would tend to keep the wall erect, it might be difficult to find invention in merely adding the form of reinforcement most suitable to create the desired tensile strength; but we find no such earlier structures. Those which have that shape are sustaining walls only, and were so obviously unfit for use as retaining walls that no one seems to have seen the utility for that purpose, of which the form, when properly adapted and strengthened, was capable. There is also a prior wall, wholly of metal, fairly disclosing a unitary heel adapted to hold the wall erect; but to see that this could become merely a skeleton embedded in concrete may well have required, in 1898, more than ordinary vision. Upon the whole, we think invention was involved, and the claims are valid." [137 C. C. A. 515, 221 Fed. 944.]

publications that preceded Bone's and we also avail ourselves of the same to show that Bone's patent was a step, not a leap, in that progress, and that the only originality that can be accorded it is in its special form, and there can be no infringement except by a copy of that form or a colorable imitation of it. We do not think the Marion county wall is subject to either accusation, and the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is affirmed.

States — relation to Federal government — police power.

1. Although the United States lacks the police power, this being reserved to the states, it is none the less true that when the United States exerts any of the powers conferred upon it by the Federal Constitution, no valid objection can be based upon the fact that such exercise may be attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise by the state of its police power, or that it may tend to accomplish a similar purpose.

[For other cases, see States, IV. d, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

War — power of Congress — constitutional limitations.

2. The war power of the United States, like its other powers, and like the police power of the states, is subject to applicable constitutional limitations; but the 5th Amendment to the Federal Constitution imposes, in this respect, no greater limitation upon the national power than does the 14th Amendment upon state power.

[For other cases, see War, VIII. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — police power — taking property without compensation.

3. If the nature and conditions of a restriction upon the use or disposition of property are such that a state could, under the police power, impose it consistently with the 14th Amendment without making compensation, then the United States may, for a permitted purpose, impose a like restriction consistently with the 5th Amendment without making compensation.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4; IV. c, 2.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — war-time prohibition.

4. Private property was not taken for public purposes without compensation, contrary to U. S. Const., 5th Amend., by the enactment by Congress, in the exercise of the war power, of the provisions of the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, fixing a period of seven months and nine days from its passage, during which distilled spirits might be disposed of free from any restriction imposed by the Federal government, and thereafter permitting, until the end of the war and the termination of demobilization, an unrestricted sale for export, and, within the United States, sales for other than beverage purposes.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4.]

War — power of Congress — war-time prohibition.

5. Assuming that the implied power of Congress to enact such a measure as the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, must depend not upon the existence of a technical state of war, terminable only with the ratification of a treaty of peace or a proclamation of peace, but upon some actual emergency or necessity arising out of the war or incident to it, the power is not limited to victories in the field and the dispersion of the hostile forces. It carries with it inherently the power to guard against the immediate renewal of the conflict, and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress.

Courts — relation to legislative department — motives — wisdom — necessity.

6. The Federal Supreme Court may not, in passing upon the validity of a Federal statute, inquire into the motives of Congress, nor may it inquire into the wisdom of the legislation, nor may it pass upon the necessity for the exercise of a power possessed.

[For other cases, see Courts, I. e, 3, a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

As to what constitutes due process of law, generally—see notes to People v. O'Brien, 2 L.R.A. 255; Kuntz v. Sumption, 2 L.R.A. 655; Re Gannon, 5 L.R.A. 359; Ulman v. shapes described by Bone as having advantage over other shapes. And there was also the suggestion of the value of a firm connection between the "vertical and horizontal member." In other words, the publication showed a retaining [144] wall having a heel such that the weight of the earth thereon would tend to keep the wall erect,—an effect and operation that Bone declares in his patent no wall had attained prior to his invention. And that effect and operation the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit considered the essence of the Bone patent, and the court said that "it might be difficult to find invention in merely adding the form of reinforcement most suitable to create the desired tensile strength."

The Stowell & Cunningham structure is, as we have said, somewhat complex in its mechanical parts. But these are but details; the physical laws that they are to avail of are explained so that "the volume of masonry" of retaining walls may be reduced, yet retain their strength by the use of metallic reinforcements.

Counsel attacks the sufficiency of the asserted anticipations, especially the publications, and in effect says that whatever conceptions lurked in them conveyed no suggestion of a "concrete entity," to use counsel's words, to execute them, and laments that Bone should be robbed of the credit and reward of adding to the world's useful instrumentalities, which, but for him, would have remained in theories and the "dust from which respondent recovered them."

To execute theories by adequate instrumentalities may indeed be invention, but an answer to petitioner's contention we have given by our comment on the Bauzeitung and Planat publications and the fullness of their expositions. Bone may have been ignorant of them and his device may not have been their suggestion. They seem to have been unknown to American engineers, not even the interest of the controversy in the sixth circuit having developed their existence. From this local ignorance nothing can be deduced favorable to the patent. Its device having been described in printed publications, although in foreign countries, patentable novelty or originality cannot be asserted for it. Rev. Stat. § 4886, Act of March 3, 1897, 29 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 391, Comp. Stat. § 9430, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 23. [145] Such is the provision of the law, and we cannot relax it in indulgence to what may seem the individual's merit.

The Circuit Court of Appeals, to show the progress of the prior art, made use of the illustrations [3] of the patents and Courts — relation to legislative department — war powers of Congress — passing of war emergency.

7. It requires a clear case to justify a court in declaring that a Federal statute adopted to increase war efficiency has ceased to be valid, on the theory that the war emergency has passed and that the power of Congress no longer continues.

[For other cases, see Courts, I. e, 8, a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

War — power of Congress — passing of war emergency — war-time prohibition.

8. The War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, cannot be said to have ceased to be valid prior to the limitation therein fixed, viz., "the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization," on the theory that the war emergency has passed, where the Treaty of Peace has not yet been concluded, the railways are still under national control by virtue of the war powers, other war activities have not been brought to a close, and it cannot even be said that the man power of the nation has been restored to a peace footing.

War — power of Congress — war-time prohibition — implied repeal by 18th Amendment.

9. The existing restriction on the sale of distilled spirits for beverage purposes, imposed by the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, was not impliedly removed by the adoption of the 18th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which, in express terms, postponed the effective date of the prohibition of the liquor traffic thereby imposed, until one year after ratification.

War — termination — cessation of war activities — war-time prohibition.

10. The war with Germany cannot be said to have been concluded within the meaning of the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, merely by reason of the actual termination of war activities.

[For other cases, see War, IX. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

War — war-time prohibition — termination.

11. The provision of the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, that it shall not cease to be operative until the "conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President," is not satisfied by passing references in various messages and proclamations of the President to the war as ended, and to demobilization as accomplished, nor by newspaper interviews with high officers of the Army, or with officials of the War Department.

Argued November 20, 1919. Decided December 15, 1919.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky to review a decree enjoining the enforcement of the War-time Prohibition Act. Reversed. Also AN APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a decree dismissing the bill in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of the War-time Prohibition Act. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Assistant Attorney General Frierson argued the cause, and, with Solicitor General King and Mr. W. V. Gregory, filed a brief for appellant in No. 589:

The statute was enacted not under the general police power, but under the war powers of Congress, and its validity depends upon whether it is an appropriate means of carrying into effect the war powers of the Federal government.

Messrs. Wayne B. Wheeler and R. C. Minton filed a brief as amici curiæ in No. 589:

The War Prohibition Act is constitutional because it has a reasonable relation to the recognized authority of Congress to support the Army and Navy, and to other war powers. It conserves the essentials to an adequate support of the Army and Navy by preventing the waste of food, fuel, transportation facilities, and manpower used in the manufacture and sale of beer, wine, and other intoxicating liquors.

The War Prohibition Act does not take private property for public use without just compensation. The decisions of the courts are uniform that the government may prohibit the liquor traffic entirely without providing any compensation to the liquor dealers.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court:

The armistice with Germany was signed November 11, 1918. Thereafter Congress passed, and, on November 21, 1918, the President approved, the War-time Prohibition Act (chap. 212, 40 Stat. at L. 1045, 1046, Comp. Stat. §§ 3115½ee, 3115½f), which provides as follows:

"That after June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and nineteen, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the nation, and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. . . ."

On October 10, 1919, the Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Company, owner of distillery warehouses and of whisky therein, brought in the district court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky a suit against Hamilton, collector of internal revenue for that district, alleging that the above act was void or had become inoperative, and praying that he be enjoined from interfering, by reason of that act, with the usual process of [154] withdrawal, distribution, and sale of the whisky in bond. The case was heard before the district judge on plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction and defendant's motion to dismiss. A decision without opinion was rendered for the plaintiff; and, the defendant declining to plead further, a final decree was entered granting a permanent injunction in accordance with the prayer of the bill. A similar suit seeking like relief was brought on October 29, 1919, by Dryfoos, Blum, & Company, in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, against Edwards, collector for that district. That case was heard on November 5 before the district judge on like motions for a preliminary injunction and to dismiss. An opinion was filed November 14, 1919, holding the act in force; and on the following day a final decree was entered, dismissing the bill.

The essential facts in the two cases differ in this: In the Kentucky case the whisky was stored in a distillery warehouse; the plaintiff was the maker of the whisky; had owned it prior to the passage of the act; and had, since June 30, 1919, paid the revenue tax on part of it. In the New York case the liquors were in general and special bonded warehouses; the plaintiffs were jobbers; and it does not appear when they became the owners of the liquors. Both cases come here by direct appeal under § 238 of the Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1157, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1215, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 794], were argued on the same day, and may be disposed of together. Four contentions are made in support of the relief prayed for: (1) That the act was void when enacted, because it violated the 5th Amendment; (2) that it became void before these suits were brought by reason of the passing of the war emergency; (3) that it was abrogated or repealed by the 18th Amendment; (4) that by its own terms it expired before the commencement of these suits. These contentions will be considered in their order.

First: Is the act void because it takes private property [155] for public purposes without compensation, in violation of the 5th Amendment? The contention is this: The Constitution did not confer police power upon Congress. Its power to regulate the liquor traffic must therefore be sought for in the implied war powers; that is, the power "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the war powers expressly granted. Art. 1, § 8, cl. 18. Congress might, under this implied power, temporarily regulate the sale of liquor, and, if reasonably necessary, forbid its sale in order to guard and promote the efficiency of the men composing the Army and the Navy, and of the workers engaged in supplying them with arms, munitions, transportation, and supplies. McKinley v. United States, 249 U. S. 397, 399, 63 L. ed. 668, 669, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 324. But the exercise of the war powers is (except in respect to property destroyed by military operations, United States v. Pacific R. Co. 120 U. S. 227, 239, 30 L. ed. 634, 638, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490) subject to the 5th Amendment. United States v. Russell, 13 Wall. 623, 627, 20 L. ed. 474, 475. The severe restriction imposed by the act upon the disposition of liquors amounts to a taking of property; and, being uncompensated, would, at least as applied to liquors acquired before the passage of the act, exceed even the restriction held to be admissible under the broad police powers possessed by the states. Therefore, since it fails to make provision for compensation, which in every other instance Congress made when authorizing the taking or use of property for war purposes,[1] it is void. Such is the argument of the plaintiffs below.

[156] That the United States lacks the police power, and that this was reserved to the states by the 10th Amendment, is true. But it is none the less true that when the United States exerts any of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, no valid objection can be based upon the fact that such exercise may be attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise by a state of its police power, or that it may tend to accomplish a similar purpose. Lottery Case (Champion v. Ames) 188 U. S. 321, 357, 47 L. ed. 492, 501, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 561; McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27, 49 L. ed. 78, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 769, 1 Ann. Cas. 561; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45, 58, 55 L. ed. 364, 368, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364; Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 323, 57 L. ed. 523, 527, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905; Seven Cases v. United States, 239 U. S. 510, 515, 60 L. ed. 411, 415, L.R.A.1916D, 164, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190; United States v. Doremus, 249 U. S. 86, 93, 94, 63 L. ed. 493, 496, 497, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214. The war power of the United States, like its other powers and like the police power of the states, is subject to applicable constitutional limitations (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 121-127, 18 L. ed. 281, 295-298; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 336, 37 L. ed. 463, 471, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622; United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 505, 571, 43 L. ed. 259, 288, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25; McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27, 61, 49 L. ed. 78, 97, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 769, 1 Ann. Cas. 561; United States v. Cress, 243 U. S. 316, 326, 61 L. ed. 746, 752, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 380); but the 5th Amendment imposes in this respect no greater limitation upon the national power than does the 14th Amendment upon state power (Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 448, 34 L. ed. 519, 524, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 930; Carroll v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 199 U. S. 401, 410, 50 L. ed. 246, 250, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 66). If the nature and conditions of a restriction [157] upon the use or disposition of property are such that a state could, under the police power, impose it consistently with the 14th Amendment without making compensation, then the United States may for a permitted purpose impose a like restriction consistently with the 5th Amendment without making compensation; for prohibition of the liquor traffic is conceded to be an appropriate means of increasing our war efficiency.

There was no appropriation of the liquor for public purposes. The War-time Prohibition Act fixed a period of seven months and nine days from its passage, during which liquors could be disposed of free from any restriction imposed by the Federal government. Thereafter, until the end of the war and the termination of mobilization, it permits an unrestricted sale for export, and, within the United States, sales for other than beverage purposes. The uncompensated restriction upon the disposition of liquors imposed by this act is of a nature far less severe than the restrictions upon the use of property acquired before the enactment of the prohibitory law, which were held to be permissible in cases arising under the 14th Amendment. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 668, 31 L. ed. 205, 212, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 23, 32 L. ed. 346, 351, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6. The question whether an absolute prohibition of sale could be applied by a state to liquor acquired before the enactment of the prohibitory law has been raised by this court, but not answered, because unnecessary to a decision. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 133, 21 L. ed. 929, 930; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 32, 33, 24 L. ed. 989, 991, 992; Eberle v. Michigan, 232 U. S. 700, 706, 58 L. ed. 803, 806, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464; Barbour v. Georgia, 249 U. S. 454, 459, 63 L. ed. 704, 707, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 316. See, however, Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 625, 657, 31 L. ed. 205, 209, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. But no reason appears why a state statute, which postpones its effective date long enough to enable those engaged in the business to dispose of stocks on hand at the date of its enactment, should be obnoxious to the 14th Amendment; or why such a Federal law should be obnoxious [158] to the 5th Amendment. We cannot say that seven months and nine days was not a reasonable time within which to dispose of all liquors in bonded warehouses on November 21, 1918. The amount then in storage was materially less than was usually carried;[2] because no such liquor could be lawfully made in America under the Lever Food and Fuel Control Act (August 10, 1917, chap. 53, § 15, 40 Stat. at L. 276, 282, Comp. Stat. § 3115¼l) after September 9, 1917. And if, as is suggested, the liquors remaining in bond November 21, 1918, were not yet sufficiently ripened or aged to permit them to be advantageously disposed of within the limited period of seven months and nine days thereafter, the resulting inconvenience to the owner, attributable to the inherent qualities of the property itself, cannot be regarded as a taking of property in the constitutional sense. Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland R. Co. 242 U. S. 311, 332, 61 L. ed. 326, 341, L.R.A.1917B, 1218, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 180, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 845.

Second: Did the act become void by the passing of the war emergency before the commencement of these suits? It is conceded that the mere cessation of hostilities under the armistice did not abridge or suspend the power of Congress to resort to prohibition of the liquor traffic [159] as a means of increasing our war efficiency; that the support and care of the Army and Navy during demobilization was within the war emergency; and that, hence, the act was valid when passed. The contention is that between the date of its enactment and the commencement of these suits it had become evident that hostilities would not be resumed; that demobilization had been effected; that thereby the war emergency was removed; and that when the emergency ceased the statute became void.

To establish that the emergency has passed, statements and acts of the President and of other executive officers are adduced; some of them antedating the enactment of the statute here in question. There are statements of the President to the effect that the war has ended [3] and peace has come; [4] that certain war agencies and activities should be discontinued; [5] that our enemies are impotent to renew hostilities; [6] and that the objects of the act here in question have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy.[7] It is shown that many war-time activities have been suspended; that vast quantities of war materials have been disposed of; that trade with Germany has been resumed; and that the censorship of postal, telegraphic, and wire communications has been removed.[8] But we have also the fact that since these statements were made and these acts [160] were done, Congress, on October 28, 1919, passed over the President's veto the National Prohibition Act, which, in making further provision for the administration of the War-time Prohibition Act, treats the war as continuing and demobilization as incomplete; that the Senate, on November 19, 1919, refused to ratify the Treaty of Peace with Germany; [9] that, under the provisions of the Lever Act, the President resumed, on October 30, 1919, the control of the fuel supply which he had relinquished partly on January 31, 1919, and partly on February 20, 1919; [10] that he is still operating the railroads, of which control had been taken as a war measure; and that on November 18, 1919, he vetoed Senate Bill 641, because it diminished that control; [11] that, pursuant to the Act of March 4, 1919, chap. 125, 40 Stat. at L. 1348, he continues to control, by means of the Food Administration Grain Corporation, the supply of grain and wheat flour; that through the United States Sugar Equalization Board, Inc., he still regulates the price of sugar; that in his message to Congress on December 2, 1919, he urgently recommended the further extension for six months of the powers of the Food Administration; that as Commander in Chief he still keeps a part of the Army in enemy-occupied territory and another part in Siberia; and that he has refrained from issuing the proclamation declaring the termination of demobilization for which this act provides.

[2] The amount of distilled spirits of all kinds in bonded warehouses June 30, 1919, was 72,358,151.1 gallons as compared with 282,036,460.2, June 30, 1914; 253,668,341.3 gallons, June 30, 1915; 232,402,878.3 gallons, June 30, 1916; 194,832,682.6 gallons, June 30, 1917; 158,959,264.5 gallons, June 30, 1918. Report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1919, p. 173. The following explanation is given by the Commissioner, p. 51, why more was not withdrawn: "The high rates of tax on spirits, fermented liquors and wines which were provided in the bill subsequently enacted into law as the Revenue Act of 1918 [Act of February 24, 1919, 40 Stat. at L. 1057, chap. 18, Comp. Stat. § 6371¼a], prompted many dealers to make heavy purchases of these commodities prior to the passage of the act, and, as a consequence of this action on the part of the dealers as well as of the expansion of prohibition territory throughout the United States, the withdrawals from bonded warehouses materially declined after the passage of the act."

The present contention may be stated thus: That, notwithstanding the act was a proper exercise of the war power of Congress at the date of its approval, and contains its own period of limitation,—"until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization,"—[161] the progress of events since that time had produced so great a change of conditions and there now is so clearly a want of necessity for conserving the man power of the nation, for increased efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, and supplies, that the prohibition of the sale of distilled spirits for beverage purposes can no longer be enforced, because it would be beyond the constitutional authority of Congress in the exercise of the war power to impose such a prohibition under present circumstances. Assuming that the implied power to enact such a prohibition must depend not upon the existence of a technical state of war, terminable only with the ratification of a treaty of peace or a proclamation of peace (United States v. Anderson, 9 Wall. 56, 70, 19 L. ed. 615, 619; The Protector, 12 Wall. 700, 702, 20 L. ed. 463, 464; J. Ribas y Hijo v. United States, 194 U. S. 315, 323, 48 L. ed. 994, 996, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 727), but upon some actual emergency or necessity arising out of the war or incident to it, still, as was said in Stewart v. Kahn (Stewart v. Bloom) 11 Wall. 493, 507, 20 L. ed. 176, 179, "The power is not limited to victories in the field and the dispersion of the insurgent forces. It carries with it inherently the power to guard against the immediate renewal of the conflict and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress."

No principle of our constitutional law is more firmly established than that this court may not, in passing upon the validity of a statute, inquire into the motives of Congress. United States v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. 142 U. S. 510, 544, 35 L. ed. 1099, 1109, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 308; McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27, 53-59, 49 L. ed. 78, 94-97, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 769, 1 Ann. Cas. 561; Weber v. Freed, 239 U. S. 325, 330, 60 L. ed. 308, 310, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 131, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 317; Dakota Cent. Teleph. Co. v. South Dakota, 250 U. S. 163, 184, 63 L. ed. 910, 924, 4 A.L.R. 1623, P.U.R.1919D, 717, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507. Nor may the court inquire into the wisdom of the legislation. M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421, 4 L. ed. 579, 605; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 197, 6 L. ed. 23, 70; Brushaber v. Union P. R. Co. 240 U. S. 1, 25, 60 L. ed. 493, 504, L.R.A. 1917D, 414, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 713; Rast v. Van Deman & L. Co. 240 U. S. 342, 357, 60 L. ed. 679, 687, L.R.A.1917A, 421, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 370, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 455. Nor may it pass upon the necessity for the exercise of a power possessed, since the possible abuse of a [162] power is not an argument against its existence. Lottery Case (Champion v. Ames) 188 U. S. 321, 363, 47 L. ed. 492, 504, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 561.

That a statute valid when enacted may cease to have validity, owing to a change of circumstances, has been recognized with respect to state laws, in several rate cases. Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 473, 57 L. ed. 1511, 1571, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18; Missouri Rate Cases (Knott v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co.) 230 U. S. 474, 508, 57 L. ed. 1571, 1594, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 975; Lincoln Gas & E. L. Co. v. Lincoln, 250 U. S. 256, 268, 63 L. ed. 968, 976, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454. That the doctrine is applicable to acts of Congress was conceded arguendo in Perrin v. United States, 232 U. S. 478, 486, 58 L. ed. 691, 695, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387, and Johnson v. Gearlds, 234 U. S. 422, 446, 58 L. ed. 1383, 1393, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 794. In each of these cases Congress had prohibited the introduction of liquor into lands inhabited by Indians, without specified limit of time; in one case the prohibition was in terms perpetual; in the other it was to continue "until otherwise provided by Congress." In both cases it was contended that the constitutional power of Congress over the subject-matter necessarily was limited to what was reasonably essential to the protection of the Indians. In the Perrin Case it was contended (p. 482) that the power was transcended because the prohibition embraced territory greatly in excess of what the situation reasonably required, and because its operation was not confined to a designated period reasonable in duration, but apparently was intended to be perpetual. In Johnson v. Gearlds the contention was (p. 442) that a prohibition originally valid had become obsolete by reason of changes in the character of the territory included in it and the status of the Indians therein. In both cases the court, while assuming that since the power to impose a prohibition of this character was incident to the presence of the Indians and their status as wards of the government, and did not extend beyond what was reasonably essential to their protection, it followed that a prohibition valid in the beginning would become inoperative when, in regular course, the Indians affected were completely emancipated from Federal guardianship and control, [163] nevertheless held that the courts would not be justified in declaring that the restriction either was originally invalid or had become obsolete if any considerable number of Indians remained wards of the government within the prohibited territory. In each case the decision rested upon the ground that the question what was reasonably essential to the protection of the Indians was one primarily for the consideration of the lawmaking body; that Congress was invested with a wide discretion; and that its action, unless purely arbitrary, must be accepted and given full effect by the courts.

Conceding, then, for the purposes of the present case, that the question of the continued validity of the War Prohibition Act under the changed circumstances depends upon whether it appears that there is no longer any necessity for the prohibition of the sale of distilled spirits for beverage purposes, it remains to be said that, on obvious grounds, every reasonable intendment must be made in favor of its continuing validity, the prescribed period of limitation not having arrived; that to Congress, in the exercise of its powers, not least the war power upon which the very life of the nation depends, a wide latitude of discretion must be accorded; and that it would require a clear case to justify a court in declaring that such an act, passed for such a purpose, had ceased to have force because the power of Congress no longer continued. In view of facts of public knowledge, some of which have been referred to, that the Treaty of Peace had not yet been concluded, that the railways are still under national control by virtue of the war powers, that other war activities have not been brought to a close, and that it cannot even be said that the man power of the nation has been restored to a peace footing, we are unable to conclude that the act has ceased to be valid.

Third: Was the act repealed by the adoption of the 18th Amendment? By the express terms of the [164] Amendment the prohibition thereby imposed becomes effective after one year from its ratification. Ratification was proclaimed on January 29, 1919 (40 Stat. at L. pt. 2, Appx.). The contention is that, as the Amendment became, on its adoption, an integral part of the Constitution, its implications are as binding as its language; that, in postponing the effective date of the prohibition, the Amendment impliedly guaranteed to manufacturers and dealers in intoxicating liquors a year of grace; and that not only was Congress prohibited thereby from enacting meanwhile new prohibitory legislation, but also that the then-existing restriction imposed by the War-time Prohibition Act was removed. See Narragansett Brewing Co. v. Baker & O'Shaunessy (Nov. 12, 1919; U. S. D. Ct. R. I.).

The 18th Amendment, with its implications, if any, is binding not only in times of peace, but in war. If there be found by implication a denial to Congress of the right to forbid before its effective date any prohibition of the liquor traffic, that denial must have been operative immediately upon the adoption of the Amendment, although at that time demobilization of the Army and the Navy was far from complete. If the Amendment effected such a denial of power, then it would have done so equally had hostilities continued flagrant or been renewed. Furthermore, the Amendment is binding alike upon the United States and the individual states. If it guarantees a year of immunity from interference by the Federal government with the liquor traffic, even to the extent of abrogating restrictions existing at the time of its adoption, it is difficult to see why the guaranty does not extend also to immunity from interference by the individual states, with like results also as to then-existing state legislation. The contention is clearly unsound.

Fourth: Did the prohibition imposed by the act expire by limitation before the commencement of these suits? The period therein prescribed is "until the conclusion of [165] the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States." It is contended both that the war has been concluded and that the demobilization has terminated.

In the absence of specific provisions to the contrary the period of war has been held to extend to the ratification of the Treaty of Peace or the proclamation of peace. J. Ribas y Hijo v. United States, 194 U. S. 315, 323, 48 L. ed. 994, 996, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 727; The Protector, 12 Wall. 700, 702, 20 L. ed. 463, 464; United States v. Anderson, 9 Wall. 56, 70, 19 L. ed. 615, 619. From the fact that other statutes concerning war activities contain each a specific provision for determining when it shall cease to be operative,[12] and from the alleged absence of [166] such a provision here, it is argued that the term "conclusion of the war" should not be given its ordinary legal meaning; that instead it should be construed as the time when actual hostilities ceased; or when the Treaty of Peace was signed at Versailles, on June 28, 1919, by the American and German representatives; or, more generally, when the actual war emergencies ceased by reason of our complete victory and the disarmament of the enemy, coupled with the demobilization of our Army and the closing of war activities; or when the declared purpose of the act of "conserving the man power of the nation, and to increase [167] efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy," shall have been fully satisfied. But there is nothing in the words used to justify such a construction. "Conclusion of the war" clearly did not mean cessation of hostilities; because the act was approved ten days after hostilities had ceased upon the signing of the armistice. Nor may we assume that Congress intended by the phrase to designate the date when the Treaty of Peace should be signed at Versailles or elsewhere by German and American representatives, since by the Constitution a treaty is only a proposal until approved by the Senate. Furthermore, to construe "conclusion of the war" as meaning the actual termination of war activities would leave wholly uncertain the date when the act would cease to be operative; whereas Congress evinced here, as in other war statutes, a clear purpose that the date of expiration should be definitely fixed. The reason why this was not directed to be done by a proclamation of peace is made clear by the use of the word "thereafter." It was expected that the "conclusion of the war" would precede the termination of demobilization. Congress, therefore, provided that the time when the act ceased to be operative should be fixed by the President's ascertaining and proclaiming the date when demobilization had terminated.

[12] The provisions fixing the date of expiration of the several war acts are as follows:

(Department Reorganization Act of May 20, 1918, chap. 78, 40 Stat. at L. 556, Comp.

It is insisted that he has done so. The contention does violence to both the language and the evident purpose of the provision. The "date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President" is a phrase so definite as to leave no room for construction. This requirement cannot be satisfied by passing references in messages to Congress, nor by newspaper interviews with high officers of the Army or with officials of the War Department. When the President mentioned in his veto message the "demobilization of the Army and Navy" the words were doubtless used in a popular sense, [168] just as he had declared to Congress, on the occasion of the signing of the armistice: "The war thus comes to an end." If he had believed on October 28, 1919, that demobilization had, in an exact sense, terminated, he would doubtless have issued then a proclamation to that effect; for he had manifested a strong conviction that restriction upon the sale of liquor should end. Only by such proclamation could the purpose of Congress be attained, and the serious consequences attending uncertainty be obviated. But in fact demobilization had not terminated at

(Food Control Act of August 10, 1917, chap. 53, 40 Stat. at L. 276, 283, Comp. Stat. §§ 3115¼e, 3115¼pp.) "Sec. 24. That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President."

(Trading with the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, chap. 106, 40 Stat. at L. 411, 412, Comp. Stat. §§ 3115½a, 3115½aa.) "The words 'end of the war,' as used herein, shall be deemed to mean the date of proclamation of exchange of ratifications of the Treaty of Peace, unless the President shall, by proclamation, declare a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be 'the end of the war,' within the meaning of this act."

(Soldiers and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of March 8, 1918, chap. 20, 40 Stat. at L. 440, at 441 and 449, Comp. Stat. §§ 3078¼a, 3078¼aa, 3078¼s.) "(5) The term 'termination of war' as used in this act shall mean the termination of the present war by the Treaty of Peace as proclaimed by the President. . . . § 603. That this act shall remain in force until the termination of the war, and for six months thereafter."

(Wheat Price Guarantee Act of March 4, 1919, chap. 125, § 11, 40 Stat. at L. 1348, 1353, Comp. Stat. § 3115¼kk(11).) "That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect whenever the President shall find that the emergency growing out of the war with Germany has passed, and that the further execution of the provisions of this act is no longer necessary for its purposes, the date of which termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than the first day of June, nineteen hundred and twenty."

the time of the veto of the Act of October 28, 1919, or at the time these suits were begun; and, for aught that appears, it has not yet terminated. The report of the Secretary of War, made to the President under date of November 11, 1919 (and transmitted to Congress on December 1), in describing the progress of demobilization, shows (p. 17) that during the preceding ten days (November 1–10) 2,018 officers and 10,266 enlisted men had been discharged; the rate of discharge being substantially the same as during the month of October —in which 8,690 officers and 33,000 enlisted men were discharged.

The War-time Prohibition Act being thus valid and still in force, the decree in Number 589 is reversed and the case is remanded to the District Court with directions to dismiss the bill; and the decree in Number 602 is affirmed.

[169] W. A. SULLIVAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF SHREVEPORT.

Courts — relation to municipal department of government.

1. Every intendment is to be made in favor of the lawfulness of the exercise of municipal power in making regulations to promote the public health and safety, and it is not the province of the courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of the power reposed by law in municipal corporations for the protection of local rights and the health and welfare of the people in the community.

[For other cases, see Courts, I. e, 5, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — police power — municipal regulation of street railways — prohibiting use of one-man cars.

2. A municipal ordinance, confessedly a valid exercise of the police power when adopted, under which each street car used in the city streets must be operated during designated hours by two persons, a motorman and a conductor, cannot be said to be so arbitrary and confiscatory as to deny due process of law when so applied as to prohibit the use on a line on which the travel is heavy at times, and which has at least one steep grade, of a new type of car still in the experimental stage, so equipped that it may plausibly be contended that if all the appliances work as it is intended that they shall, it may be operated at a reduced cost by one motorman, with a high degree of safety to the public in streets where the traffic is not heavy.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4; IV. c, 2, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Submitted November 17, 1919. Decided December 15, 1919.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the City Court of Shreveport, convicting a superintendent of a street railway company of violating an ordinance forbidding the use of one-man cars. Affirmed.

See same case below, 142 La. 573, 77 So. 286.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. H. Randolph submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but subject to the supervision of the courts.

Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499.

It may be admitted that every intendment is to be made in favor of the lawfulness of the exercise of municipal power, making regulations to promote the public health and safety, and that it is not the province of the courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of the power reposed by law in municipal corporations for the protection of local rights and the health and welfare of the people in the community. But, notwithstanding this general rule of the law, it is now thoroughly well settled that municipal by-laws and ordinances, and even legislative enactments undertaking to regulate useful business enterprises, are subject to investigation in the courts with a view of determining whether the law or ordinance is a lawful exercise of the police power, or whether, under the guise of enforcing police regulations, there has been an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with the constitutional rights to carry on a law-than one man to operate a street car have generally been sustained under the police power. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Berry, 93 Ky. 43, 15 L.R.A. 604, 40 Am. St. Rep. 161, 18 S. W. 1026; State, Trenton Horse R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L.R.A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076; State ex rel. Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co. v. Sloan, 48 S. C. 21, 25 S. E. 898.

In South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Berry, supra, an ordinance requiring both a driver and a conductor to accompany every street car was held to be a proper exercise by a municipality of the police power. It appeared that the cars involved in this case passed through crowded thoroughfares and centers of crowded population; that persons were constantly getting on and off the cars, which were apt to be crowded, at least in the morning and evening, as persons go and return from their business.

The ordinance involved in State, Trenton Horse R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L.R.A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076, was sustained under a general grant of the police power. There were, in addition to the general grant of police power to the municipality, two special grants: one granting to the municipality the power to prescribe the manner in which corporations or persons should exercise any privilege granted to them in the use of the streets; another conferring power to license and regulate vehicles used for the transportation of passengers and merchandise. The court states that so far as the special grants relate to the power to require more than one man in the operation of a street car, neither of the particular delegations of power added anything to the right to exercise the police power generally granted. It is stated further that, the question being one of the exercise of the police power, the only question remaining is whether the regulation is reasonable. The ordinance in question required the street car company to have an agent in addition to the driver to assist in the control of the car and passengers, and to prevent accidents and disturbances of the good order and security of the streets, and this ordinance was held, upon its face, not to be an unreasonable regulation. . .

Under certain grants of power to municipal corporations, the right of the municipality to enact such an ordinance has been denied. Brooklyn Crosstown R. Co. v. Brooklyn, 37 Hun, 413; Thornhill v. Cincinnati, 4 Ohio C. C. 354, 2 Ohio C. D. 592.

In Brooklyn Crosstown R. Co. v. Brooklyn, supra, the power of the common council to pass the ordinance was claimed to exist under the act consolidating the companies, which created the street railway company in this case, which act provided "that in the construction, maintenance and operation of said road said new company shall be subject to any and all laws or ordinances that have been or may be established and in force by the common council of the city of Brooklyn for the regulation of horse railroads generally." The power was also claimed to exist by virtue of a statute authorizing the common council to "regulate and license common carriers, carriers of passengers, etc. . . . The common council shall also fix an annual license fee not exceeding the sum of $20, for each street or horse car daily operated or used in said city. . . . Said license fees shall be taken in full satisfaction for the use of the streets or avenues, but the same shall not relieve said companies from any obligation now required by law to keep such streets and avenues or any part thereof in repair." The members of the court are not agreed as to the reason for the invalidity of the ordinance. Barnard, P. J., holds that the subjection of the street railway company in the construction, maintenance, and operation of its road to the laws and ordinances of the city is not a general subjection, and does ful business or make contracts, or to use and enjoy property.

Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 49 L. ed. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18.

Mr. James E. Smitherman submitted the cause for defendant in error. Messrs. B. F. Roberts and John F. Phillips were on the brief:

Power to regulate implies full power over the things to be regulated.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23.

Under the general police power municipal corporations have the right to require a certain number of servants on each car, as a driver and a conductor.

3 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. p. 2095.

Ordinances under the general police power may require a conductor and a driver on each car.

South Covington & C. Street R. Co.

not legalize the ordinance; and further, that since the statute conferred upon the city authority to regulate and license common carriers generally, and to fix an annual license fee for street railroad cars, it seems to have been the intention of the legislature not to delegate to the municipality the power to enact the ordinance in question. Pratt, J., is also of the opinion that, "in view of the fact that the statute gives to the trustees of horse railways the power to manage the affairs of railway companies 'and to regulate the manner in which passengers shall be transported,' it is quite clear that the indefinite power to 'license and regulate common carriers,' remaining in the city charter, does not warrant the passage of an ordinance regulating the manner of the interior facilities of a car, or necessitating the use of a large instead of a small car." Pratt, J., seems to have been of the opinion that the validity of the ordinance in question depended somewhat upon its reasonableness.

Statutory authority: "1. To prevent riots, gambling, noise, and disturbance, indecent or disorderly conduct or assemblages, and preserve the peace and good order, and protect the property of the municipal corporation and its inhabitants. . . . 3. To prevent injury or annoyance from anything dangerous, offensive, or unwholesome, and to cause any nuisance to be abated," does not confer authority upon a municipality to enact a penal ordinance making it an offense to operate a street car without having a conductor thereon in addition to a driver. Thornhill v. Cincinnati, supra.

Statutory authority "to regulate the use of carts, drays, wagons, hackney coaches, ... and every description of carriages, which may be kept for hire or livery stable purposes," does not confer authority upon the municipality to enact a penal ordinance making it an offense to run cars without both a driver and conductor. Ibid.

The duty of a street railway company which constructed its road under an ordinance providing that it was to be operated under the general street railroad ordinance of the city, one of the sections of which provided that no cars should be run without both a driver and conductor, to comply with the ordinance, cannot be enforced by a penal ordinance subjecting to punishment by fine or imprisonment for failure to comply with its provisions. Ibid.

A street railway company which at first operated double horse cars under a contract with the city which required it to employ careful, sober, and civil agents, conductors, and drivers to take charge of its cars, and which subjected it also to such regulations of the common council of the municipality as such council may, from time to time, deem necessary for the protection of the citizens of the municipality, cannot, when it has replaced such large cars with smaller one-horse cars, be required by the municipality to maintain a conductor in addition to the driver. Toronto v. Toronto Street R. Co. 15 Ont. App. Rep. 30. Patterson, J. A., states that nothing can turn upon the stipulation that the company shall at all times employ careful, sober, and civil agents, conductors, and drivers to take charge of its cars; that the only cars in use at the time of the drafting of the agreement being the large car which carried two men, the aim of the draftsman was evidently to require the employment of careful, sober, and civil men, and not to provide that any number of men should be employed. The right to impose such a duty upon the company is also denied under the provision that it shall operate its road subject to such regulations as the common council may deem necessary for the protection of the citizens of a municipality; Patterson, J. A., stating that the requirement in question was a direction to the company as to the mode in which it was to conduct its business,—a matter which, if the council can meddle with it at all, must be the subject of a joint agreement.

v. Berry, 93 Ky. 43, 15 L.R.A. 604, 40 Am. St. Rep. 161, 18 S. W. 1026; State, Trenton Horse R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L.R.A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076.

Requiring an agent in addition to a driver on each street car is reasonable.

State, Trenton Horse R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Trenton, supra.

Every reasonable intendment of ordinances should be looked for in order to give validity to an ordinance which is within the municipal power. Words signifying the will of the governing body should be given full effect, without regard to the niceties of diction.

28 Cyc. 352; 2 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. p. 1742.

The legislature has constitutional power to enable the council to legislate on matter within the scope of the charter, notwithstanding the Constitution has declared that legislative power shall be vested in a senate, house of representatives, and the governor.

Mayor v. Morgan, 7 Mart. (N. S.) 1, 18 Am. Dec. 232.

Railway companies with yards or terminals in cities of the state may, consistently with due process of law, be forbidden by a state statute to conduct switching operations across public crossings in cities of the first and second class with a switching crew of not less than one engineer, a fireman, a foreman, and three helpers, although the statute creates an exemption in favor of railways less than 100 miles in length, the crews of which may operate over the same identical crossings.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Arkansas, 240 U. S. 518, 60 L. ed. 776, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443.

It will be necessary to show that a railway system, as a whole, would operate at a loss, and not merely that a certain line of the system was operating for less than cost, in order to plead that property is being taken without due process of law, or that the equal protection of the law is being denied.

State legislatures may not only exercise their sovereignty directly, but may delegate such portions of it to inferior legislative bodies as, in their judgment, is desirable for local purposes.

It is not the province of the courts to take issue with the lawmakers as to the wisdom or necessity of a statute or ordinance enacted ostensibly in the exercise of the police power, unless the enactments have no real or reasonable relation to public safety, public health, or morals,—are abuses of the police power, under the pretense of promoting public safety, health, or morals.

Shreveport v. Sullivan, 142 La. 573, 77 So. 286.

In 1907 the city of Shreveport, Louisiana, passed an ordinance requiring that each street car used in its streets should be operated during designated hours by two persons, a conductor and a motorman, and providing penalties for its violation.

The company with street railway lines in the city complied with the requirement until in June, 1917, when it procured some cars equipped for operation by one man, and attempted to use them on its "Allendale line," with only a motorman in charge. Thereupon the plaintiff in error, hereinafter designated the defendant, who was superintendent of the railway company, was arrested for violation of the ordinance.

He defended by filing a motion to quash the affidavit for arrest, on the ground that the ordinance was unreasonable and arbitrary and that the enforcement of it would deprive the company of its property without due process of law and without compensation, in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The motion to quash was "referred to the merits," a full trial was had, the motion was overruled, and the defendant, found guilty, was sentenced to pay a fine. The judgment of the supreme court of Louisiana affirming this judgment is before us for review on writ of error.

The defense introduced evidence tending to show that the new type of car used was so equipped that it could be operated by one motorman with safety to the public as great as was secured by cars theretofore used when operated by two men. The car, designated in the record as "a one-man car," is described as so arranged that passengers enter and leave it only at the front end, where the motorman is placed. It is so equipped electrically that the motorman must remain in an assigned [171] position necessary for the discharge of his duties, and must perform "some conscious act" at all times when the car is in motion. If he fails in this "conscious act" the current is automatically cut off, the brakes are applied in emergency, the rail is sanded, and the door of the car is unlocked, and is so adjusted that opening it lowers the step for use. There is testimony tending to show economy in the use of such cars, not only in the saving of the wages of one man, but also in immunity from accident.

It is apparent from this description derived from the record that it presents for decision the question: Whether the Ordinance of 1907, confessedly a valid exercise of the police power when it was passed, was rendered arbitrary and invalid by the development of a car which it is claimed can be operated by one man with as much safety to the traveling public as, and with less cost than, was secured by the two-man car in use at the time the ordinance was passed, and which was contemplated by it.

It is not necessary to decide in this case whether a valid regulating ordinance can be rendered invalid by a change of conditions which renders it arbitrary and confiscatory (Lincoln Gas & E. L. Co. v. Lincoln, 250 U. S. 256, 269, 63 L. ed. 968, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454; Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 473, 57 L. ed. 1511, 1571, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18; Johnson v. Gearlds, 234 U. S. 422, 426, 58 L. ed. 1383, 1385, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 794; Perrin v. United States, 232 U. S. 478, 481, 58 L. ed. 691, 693, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387; Municipal Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 225 N. Y. 89, 95, 97, P.U.R.1919C, 364, 121 N. E. 772; and Castle v. Mason, 91 Ohio St. 296, 303, 110 N. E. 463, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 164), for the claim that such a change of condition had arisen in the case is stoutly disputed by the city authorities.

While on the record before us it might be plausibly contended that when all the appliances on the "one-man car" work as it was intended they should, it could be operated with a high degree of safety in streets where the traffic is not heavy, yet there is evidence that, in the short period of the operation of such cars in Shreveport, [172] the brakes on one of them failed to operate on a descending grade, resulting in the car getting out of control under conditions which, except for good fortune, might have resulted in serious accident. A passenger testified to receiving slight injuries when entering a car, due to the premature closing of the door, and he attributed the accident to the presence of other persons between him and the motorman whose duty it was to close the door. It was in evidence that the line on which these cars were placed, while in general one of light travel, extended into the principal business section of a city of 40,000 inhabitants; that it had at least one steep grade in it, and that at times the travel was heavy and the cars crowded.

It is obvious, and not disputed, that such cars are better adapted to light than to heavy travel, for all passengers must enter and leave at one door, and one man must take fares, make change, issue transfers, answer questions, and also remain in position to start the car promptly. So occupied and placed, plainly this one man could not render such assistance as is often necessary to infirm or crippled or very young passengers, or to those encumbered with baggage or bundles, and it would not be difficult to suggest emergencies of storm or accident in which a second man might be of first importance to the safety and comfort of passengers.

These "one-man cars" at the time of trial were, as yet, experimental, and enough has been said to show that in each community the operation of street cars presents such special problems—due to the extent and character of the travel, to grades and other conditions—that, with peculiar appropriateness, they have been committed by the law primarily to the disposition of the local authorities, whose determination will not be disturbed by the courts, except in cases in which the power has been exercised in a manner clearly arbitrary and oppressive. The rule is, "that every [173] intendment is to be made in favor of the lawfulness of the exercise of municipal power, making regulations to promote the public health and safety, and that it is not the province of the courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of the power reposed by law in municipal corporations for the protection of local rights and the health and welfare of the people in the community." Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 235, 49 L. ed. 169, 175, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18. Since the record, as we have thus discussed it, fails to show a clear case of arbitrary conduct on the part of the local authorities, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana is affirmed.

VILLAGE OF UPPER SANDUSKY.

Constitutional law — impairing contract obligations — due process of law — police power — municipal regulation of electric company.

1. Any modification of the rights of an electric light and power company which it may suffer by the enactment, in the exercise of the police power, of a statute giving the municipal authorities complete control over the placing in the streets of poles and wires for conducting electricity for lighting and power purposes, instead of the like control which they had when the franchise was granted, but subject to resort to the probate court in case of disagreement with the company as to the mode of using the streets, does not constitute an impairing of the obligation of the company's contract with the state or municipality, and is not a taking of its property without due process of law.

2. The obligation of a municipal electric light and power franchise covering public and private uses, granted when the applicable statute then in force gave the municipality a qualified control over the erection of electric light and power appliances in the streets, was not impaired by subsequent legislation giving the municipality exclusive control, under which the light and power company, having removed and dismantled its street lighting system upon the expiration of a street lighting contract, may be restrained from erecting any poles or wires in the street until the consent of the municipality shall have been obtained, without prejudice to the company's right to maintain, repair, or replace such poles and wires as it is then using for commercial lighting.

A decision of the highest court of a state is not reviewable in the Federal Supreme Court as presenting the question whether contract obligations were impaired by the effect given to a municipal ordinance repealing a street lighting and power franchise, where this contention was first made in the intermediate state appellate court, and no effect whatever was given to such ordinance, either by that court or by the state court of last resort, each court reaching the conclusion under review independently of and without reference to such ordinance.

The notion that a corporation which has, upon the strength of a permission to use streets, spent thousands of dollars in erecting its poles and stretching its wires, is at the mercy of the city authorities continually and entirely, is not to be entertained for a moment.

State, Hudson Teleph. Co., Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 49 N. J. L. 30, 60 Am. Rep. 619, 8 Atl. 123.

Mr. W. R. Hare argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1889 the council of the village of Upper Sandusky, Ohio, enacted an ordinance, authorizing an electric light and power company, and its assigns, to use the streets of the village for the purpose of erecting and operating electric light wires for the distribution of electric light and power. The ordinance declared that "the privilege hereby granted" shall entitle the company "to manufacture, sell, and distribute light and power by means of electricity to the citizens of the village for public and private uses."

The grantee, accepting the franchise, constructed a generating plant, erected poles, wires, and lamps, and, until the year 1912, lighted the streets of the village and sold current to private consumers. In that year the plant and franchise were purchased by the plaintiff in error, hereinafter referred to as the Company, which continued to light the streets until the contract which its predecessor had with the village expired. Upon the expiration of that contract the parties entered upon negotiations for a new one; but, failing to agree, the Company, in October, 1913, removed all of its street lights and took down its poles and [175] wires used for such lighting, but continued its commercial business.

In about a year after the Company ceased to light the village streets this action was commenced by the filing of a petition by the village, which, averring the facts we have stated, further alleged that, prior to the removal of the street lighting appliances, the village had submitted to the Company a schedule of fair prices which it was able and willing to pay for street lighting, and which it was willing to authorize the Company to charge for commercial lighting and for power, but this was rejected; that by dismantling its street lighting system the Company had rendered itself wholly unable to furnish any light whatever for the purpose of public lighting; that, without the consent of the village, it was threatening to place new poles and wires in the streets "to further advance its private interests;" that it had forfeited all rights in the streets, and that it was not possible for the village and Company to agree upon terms for future lighting.

The prayer was that the Company be enjoined from erecting additional poles, that its franchise be declared forfeited, and that it be required to remove all of its equipment from the public streets.

The trial court dismissed the petition, but, on appeal, the court of appeals enjoined the Company from erecting poles, wires, or lamps in the streets "until the consent of said village shall have been obtained." This decree was affirmed by the supreme court of Ohio in the judgment we are reviewing.

In its opinion the supreme court held that there was no bill of exceptions or properly authenticated finding of facts before it, and that therefore the case must be decided upon the assumption that all of the allegations of the petition were sustained by the evidence; that at the time the Ordinance of 1889 was passed and accepted, the applicable state statute provided that the "mode" of use of [176] the streets shall be such as shall be agreed upon between the municipal authorities of the village and the Company, but, if they cannot agree, the probate court of the county shall direct what the mode of use shall be (Rev. Stat. 1880, § 3471a; 84 Ohio Laws, 7; and Rev. Stat. § 3461); and that, by an act of the legislature passed in 1896, seven years after the date of the village ordinance, the state law was amended into the form which continued to the time of trial, providing that "in order to subject the same to municipal control alone, no person or company shall place, string, construct or maintain any line, wire fixture or appliance of any kind for conducting electricity for lighting, heating and power purposes through any street, etc., without the consent of such municipality." 92 Ohio Laws, 204.

This amended law of 1896 is made the basis of the only contention in the case which is sufficiently substantial for special notice; viz., that by it the obligation was impaired of the contract which the Company had with the state and village, arising from its acceptance of the Ordinance of 1889, and that it was thereby deprived of its property without due process of law.

As we have seen, when the Ordinance of 1889 was passed, the statute then in force provided that the "mode" in which the streets could be used for electric lighting and power appliances must be agreed upon between the village and the Company; but that, if they failed to agree, it must be determined by the probate court; and the amendment, now claimed to be unconstitutional, consisted simply in giving to the municipality the exclusive control over the erection of any such appliances in the streets, instead of the prior qualified control. In this case the original "mode" of use was determined by agreement without action by the probate court.

The prayer of the petition was that, because of the dismantling of the street lighting plant and of its refusal to [177] agree to reasonable rates for the future, all rights of the Company in the streets should be declared forfeited, and that it should be ordered to remove from them all of its constructions; but the decree of the court of appeals, affirmed by the supreme court, went to the extent, only, of restraining the Company from erecting any poles and wires in the streets "until the consent of the village shall have been obtained." There was nothing in the decree affecting the maintenance or renewal of such poles and wires as were in use for private lighting when the case was commenced, and that this omission was of deliberate purpose appears from .the fact that both courts held that the state statutes in force at the time the grant became effective, and the form of the proceeding, were such that a decree annulling such rights as the Company had then retained in the streets could not properly be entered in the cause. On this point the supreme court said:

"In this posture of the case, while, in view of the statutory provisions which were in force at the inception of the enterprise, the village would not be entitled to annul the company's rights, still, by reason of the facts stated above and the voluntary abandonment by the company of its rights and privileges to the extent set forth, it cannot now return and repossess itself of such rights as it abandoned without the consent of the village in accordance with existing law." [93 Ohio St. 442, 113 N. E. 402.]

From this state of the record we conclude that the state supreme court did not intend to deal with the right of the company to maintain, repair, or replace such poles and wires as it was using for commercial lighting when the case was commenced, but that its injunction was intended to prohibit restoring of the street lighting poles and wires which had been taken down and all new additional construction "until the consent of said village shall have been obtained;" and, so restrained, its judgment will be affirmed, based, as it is, upon the Statute of 1896, which the court [178] holds, upon abundant reason and authority, was passed in a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state.

This act was a general one, applicable to all electric lighting companies then operating, or which might thereafter operate, in the state, and all that it did was to give to the municipal authorities complete control over the placing in the streets of poles and wires for conducting electricity for lighting and power purposes, instead of the like control which they had when the franchise was granted, but subject to resort to the probate court in case of disagreement with the company as to the "mode" of using the streets.

We cannot doubt that the danger to life and property from wires carrying high tension electric current through village streets is so great that the subject is a proper one for regulation by the exercise of the police power, and very certainly the authorities of the municipality immediately interested in the safety and welfare of its citizens are a proper agency to have charge of such regulation. Any modification of its rights which the company may suffer from this law, passed in a reasonable exercise of the police power, does not constitute an impairing of the obligation of its contract with the state or village, and is not a taking of its property without due process of law within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition. Northern P. R. Co. v. Puget Sound & W. H. R. Co. 250 U. S. 332, 63 L. ed. 1013, P.U.R.1919D, 728, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 474, and cases cited.

Of the contention that if an ordinance passed in 1915 by the village, repealing the Ordinance of 1889, were given effect, it would result in impairing the obligation of the contract, it is enough to say that it first appears in a supplemental answer filed in the court of appeals, and the case, as we have seen, was disposed of on the assumption that all of the allegations of the petition were sustained by the evidence. No effect whatever was given to that ordinance, either by the court of appeals or by the supreme [179] court, but each reached the conclusion we are reviewing independently of and without reference to it. Cross Lake Shooting & Fishing Club v. Louisiana, 224 U. S. 632, 639, 56 L. ed. 924, 928, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577; Long Sault Development Co. v. Call, 242 U. S. 272, 277, 61 L. ed. 294, 299, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 79.

It results that, since the change of law complained of did not impair any Federal constitutional right of the plaintiff in error, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio, restrained to the scope of its opinion, as we have interpreted it, must be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Day did not participate in the discussion or decision of this case.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the Parish of St. Bernard, in that state, dismissing the petition in a suit to enjoin the collection of a drainage tax. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

See same case below, 142 La. 812, 77 So. 640.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. C. Milling argued the cause, and, with Mr. R. E. Milling, filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William Winans Wall argued the cause, and, with Mr. N. H. Nunez, filed a brief for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

By petition filed in the district court, St. Bernard parish, plaintiff in error sought to restrain collection of an acreage tax assessed against its lands not susceptible of gravity drainage. Invalidity of the tax was alleged upon the ground that no statute of Louisiana authorized it, and also because its enforcement would produce practical confiscation and take property without due process of law, contrary to the 14th Amendment. Answering, defendant in error asked dismissal of the petition, claiming the tax was properly assessed, and also that an amendment to article 281 of the Louisiana Constitution, adopted November, 1914, deprived the court of jurisdiction to entertain the contest. The trial court exercised jurisdiction, sustained the tax, and dismissed the petition. Upon a broad appeal, the supreme court, after declaring that the constitutional amendment deprived the courts of the state of jurisdiction over the controversy, affirmed the judgment of the trial court. 142 La. 812, 77 So. 640.

The record fails to disclose that plaintiff in error at any time or in any way challenged the validity of the state constitutional amendment because of conflict with the Federal Constitution until it applied for a rehearing in the supreme court. That application was refused without more. Here the sole error assigned is predicated upon such supposed conflict; and, unless that point was properly raised below, a writ of error cannot bring the cause before us.

Such a writ only lies to review "a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a state in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in [181] question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity." Judicial Code, § 237, Act September 6, 1916, chap. 448, 39 Stat. at L. 726, Comp. Stat. § 1214, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 412.

The settled rule is that, in order to give us jurisdiction to review the judgment of a state court upon writ of error, the essential Federal question must have been especially set up there at the proper time and in the proper manner; and, further, that if first presented in a petition for rehearing, it comes too late unless the court actually entertains the

The writ of error is dismissed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE concurs in the result, solely on the ground that, as the court below exerted jurisdiction and decided the cause,—by the judgment to which the writ of error is directed,—the contention that a Federal right was violated by the refusal of the court to take jurisdiction is too unsubstantial and frivolous to give rise to a Federal question.

v.

R. F. BUSH, Receiver of the Property of St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company.

Constitutional law — equal protection of the laws — assessment for public improvement — railway franchise.

1. The consideration by assessing officers, conformably to state law, of the franchises of a railway company, when assessing for a public improvement the real estate of a railway company within the taxing district, does not, without more, justify invalidating the tax as a denial of the equal protection of the laws, on the theory that the franchises of the railway company were included as a separate personal-property value in the real property assessment, thus taxing the railway property at a higher rate than other real property in the district.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. a, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — assessment for public improvement — lands benefited.

2. The legislative determination as to what lands within a local improvement district will be benefited by an improvement is conclusive upon the owners and the courts, and can be assailed, under U. S. Const., 14th Amend., only where the legislative action is arbitrary, wholly unwarranted, a flagrant abuse, and, by reason of its arbitrary character, a confiscation of particular property.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 6, c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — public improvement — assessment for benefits.

3. The declaration by the legislature that the real property of a railway company within a road improvement district will be benefited by the construction of a contemplated road improvement in such district cannot be said to be so arbitrary, capricious, or confiscatory as to invalidate under U. S. Const., 14th Amend., an assessment for benefits against such real property of the railway company, where there is evidence that the improved road, by making more accessible a village terminus where the railway company in question had the only line, and by developing the adjacent country, would increase the company's business and would divert business from a place where there was a competing railroad, and that before the road was completed a large gas-producing district was discovered not far from the improved road, which was tributary to it.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 6, c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 14, 1919. Decided December 22, 1919.

APPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit to review a decree which reversed a decree of the District Court for the Western District of Arkansas, refusing to enjoin an assessment of real property of a railway company for a road improvement. Reversed, and decree of District Court affirmed.

See same case below, 160 C. C. A. 387, 248 Fed. 377.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George B. Rose argued the cause, and, with Messrs. W. E. Hemingway, D. H. Cantrell, and J. F. Loughborough, filed a brief for appellants:

In matters of local improvements this court is loath to interfere with the public policy of the respective states.

French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 181 U. S. 324, 45 L. ed. 879, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Knisel, 79 Ark. 608, 96 S. W. 342.

A highway is an improvement justifying a local assessment against a railroad.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

By act of the general assembly, the state of Arkansas created "Crawford County Road Improvement District No. 2," a body corporate, and prescribed its boundaries. Special and Private Acts of Arkansas, 1911, p. 642.

To pay the cost of the road improvement contemplated, the act provided that it should be made a charge upon all of the real property, railroads, and tramroads in the District. Bonds were sold and the road completed before this suit was commenced to enjoin the collection of taxes charged against the property of the railway company, of which the appellee, hereinafter designated the Company, was receiver. The tax objected to was imposed upon the assessed value of the main track, sidetracks, rolling stock, buildings, and material of the Company apportioned to the Road District under a state law for the valuation of railroad property, and in the bill it is alleged to be invalid because the assessment conflicts with many provisions of the Constitutions of the United States and of Arkansas. The rate was the same for all real property in the district.

The district court permanently enjoined the tax to the extent that it was imposed on personal property,—the rolling stock and materials of the company. From this part of the decree no appeal was taken, and thereafter all questions as to the invalidity of the assessment because including rolling stock and materials disappeared from the case. But, for want of equity, the bill was dismissed so [184] far as applicable to the real estate "designated in the bill as main track, sidetrack, and buildings." On appeal by the Company from this part of the decree, the circuit court of appeals reversed the decree of the district court and enjoined the collection of the tax on the real estate on two grounds:

(1) Because the including of the franchise and other intangible property of the Company in the assessment results in "a higher rate of taxation" on the property of the Railway Company than on the other property in the District; and

(2) Because the evidence fails to show that the Company would derive any benefit from the improvement of the road.

In this court the plaintiffs in error, hereinafter referred to as the Road District, assign as errors these two holdings of the circuit court of appeals, and we shall consider them in the order stated.

All property of the Railway Company in the state was assessed by a state tax commission under an act, the validity of which is not assailed, providing:

"The franchises (other than the right to be a corporation) of all railroads . . . are declared to be property for the purpose of taxation, and the value of such franchises shall be considered by the assessing officers when assessing the property of such corporations." Acts of Arkansas, 1911, p. 233, § 2.

The act also required the commission to "determine the total value of the entire property of the corporation, tangible and intangible;" that the buildings and sidetracks should be assessed as real estate in the town or district where located, but that the main track, also to be assessed as real estate, should be apportioned among the several towns and districts through which the road ran according to the "actual mileage in each town or district."

[185] The circuit court of appeals did not hold either the Railroad Valuation or the District Road Improvement Law unconstitutional, both being types of laws often upheld by this court (State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 663; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122, and Houck v. Little River Drainage Dist. 239 U. S. 254, 60 L. ed. 266, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58), but the first ground of its decision was, only, that the assessment of the main track under the former law, as applied to the case of taxation by benefits provided for by the latter, resulted in unequal taxation to an extent amounting to a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

The court was carried to its conclusion by this process: The act creating the Road District, and the general law applicable to local assessments in proportion to benefits, both required that only real estate should be assessed to pay for the improvement here involved; only the real estate of the other property owners of the District was assessed, and therefore, when the franchises, personalty, of the Railroad Company were "considered" in making the assessment complained of, the Company was taxed a "higher rate," a greater amount, than other property owners, and by such discrimination was denied the equal protection of the laws.

It is argued by the Road District that this conclusion is erroneous, for the reasons following:

The assessment law, which we have quoted, provides that the franchises of railroad companies ("other than the right to be a corporation") "shall be considered" by officials when assessing their property.

It is to be noted that this law does not provide for the assessment of the franchises of railroad companies separately as personal, or intangible, property, as the laws of some states require, but only declares that they are "property" which "shall be considered by assessing officers when assessing the property of such corporations," and they are not valued separately in the [186] assessment complained of, as it is itemized in the bill of complaint.

It is not easy to define just what is meant by the "franchise" of a railroad company "other than the right to be a corporation," and the record does not attempt a definition. Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 217, 223, 23 L. ed. 860, 861. The record is also silent as to what, if any, value was placed upon the franchises of the Company here involved by the state tax commission, and as to what extent, if at all, they were "considered" in arriving at the assessment objected to, and therefore, it is contended that the conclusion of the circuit court of appeals that personal-property value was included in the assessment of the real estate of the District has no foundation on which to rest, other than the assumption that the tax commission conformed to the law and "considered" the franchises when assessing the real estate, and that this necessarily resulted in fact, if not in form, in such inclusion,—an unusually meager basis, surely, for invalidating a tax of the familiar character of this before us.

If, however, the distinction sometimes taken between the "essential properties of corporate existence" and the franchises of a corporation (Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. (Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Berry) 112 U. S. 609, 619, 28 L. ed. 837, 841, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 299) be considered substantial enough to be of practical value, and if it be assumed that the distinction was applied by the state commission in making the assessment here involved, this would result, not in adding personal-property value to the value of the real estate of the Company in the District, but simply in determining what the value of the real property was,—its right of way, tracks, and buildings,—having regard to the use which it made of it as an instrumentality for earning money in the conduct of railroad operations. This, at most, is no more than giving to the real property a value greater as a part of a railroad unit and a going concern [187] than it would have if considered only as a quantity of land, buildings, and tracks.

This is the method of assessing railroad property often approved by this court, specifically in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439, 445, 38 L. ed. 1041, 1046, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122, saying:

"The rule of property taxation is that the value of the property is the basis of taxation. It does not mean a tax upon the earnings which the property makes, nor for the privilege of using the property, but rests solely upon the value. But the value of property results from the use to which it is put, and varies with the profitableness of that use, present and prospective, actual and anticipated. There is no pecuniary value outside of that which results from such use. The amount and profitable character of such use determines the value, and if property is taxed at its actual cash value it is taxed upon something which is created by the uses to which it is put. In the nature of things it is practically impossible—at least in respect to railroad property—to divide its value, and determine how much is caused by one use to which it is put and how much by another."

And long experience has confirmed the statement by Mr. Justice Miller in State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 608, 23 L. ed. 669, 671, that "it may well be doubted whether any better mode of determining the value of that portion of the track within any one county has been devised than to ascertain the value of the whole road, and apportion the value within the county by its relative length to the whole." And see Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 29 L. ed. 414, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57, in which, also, the contention is disposed of that the railroad track should be valued by the same officials and on the same basis of acreage as farm lands adjacent to it.

Thus, the assessment complained of

was made under valid laws and in a manner approved and customary in arriving at the value of that part of railroad tracks [188] situate in a state, county, or district. So far as this record shows, the assessment modified by the decree of the district court, not appealed from, is not a composite of real and personal-property values, but is the ascertained value of the real estate—the tracks and buildings—of the Company within the taxing district, enhanced, no doubt, by the special use made of it, but still its value as a part of the railroad unit, resulting from the inherent nature of the business in which it is employed, —a value which will not be resolved into its constituent elements for the purpose of defeating contribution to a public improvement. No attempt was made to prove fraudulent or capricious or arbitrary action on the part of any officials in making the assessment, the only evidence upon the subject being the opinions of four employees of the Company that the improvement of the road would not benefit the railroad property, and, if inequality has resulted from the application of the state law in a customary manner to a situation frequently arising in our country, it is an incidental inequality, resulting from a valid classification of railroad property for taxation purposes, which does not fall within the scope of the 14th Amendment, which "was not intended to compel the states to adopt an iron rule of equal taxation." Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 237, 33 L. ed. 892, 895, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533. And see French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 181 U. S. 324, 45 L. ed. 879, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625; Cass Farm Co. v. Detroit, 181 U. S. 396, 398, 45 L. ed. 914, 916, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644; Detroit v. Parker, 181 U. S. 399, 45 L. ed. 917, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 624.

Thus, the basis for assuming that the franchises of the railroad company were added as a separate personal-property value to the assessment of the real property of the company becomes, upon this record, much too unsubstantial to justify invalidating the tax involved if it be otherwise valid, and the first assignment of error must therefore be sustained.

But the holding of the circuit court of appeals that [189] "the evidence fails to show that the railroad company derives any benefit from the road" is also assigned as error.

In the act of the general assembly creating this Road District it is provided:

"Section 5. It is ascertained and hereby declared that all real property within said District, including railroads and tramroads, will be benefited by the building of the said highway more than the cost thereof as apportioned in the county assessment of each piece of property within the District for this and the succeeding years, and the cost thereof is made a charge upon such real property superior to all other mortgages and liens except the liens for the ordinary taxes, and for improvement districts heretofore organized; . . ." Special & Private Acts of Arkansas, 1911, 642, 645.

Where, in laws creating districts for local improvements and taxation, there is such a legislative declaration as this, as to what lands within the district will be benefited by the improvement, the law with respect to the extent to which such determination may be reviewed by the courts is so well settled, and has so lately been re-examined and restated by this court, that extended discussion of the subject is not justified.

In Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921,—a decision often cited and approved,—it is decided that if the proposed improvement is one which the state had authority to make and pay for by assessments on property benefited, the legislature, in the exercise of the taxing power, has authority to determine, by the statute imposing the tax, what lands, which might be benefited by the improvement, are in fact benefited by it; and if it does so, its determination is conclusive upon the owners and the courts, and the owners have no right to be heard on the question whether their lands have been benefited or not.

The subject was carefully re-examined and the law [190] restated in cases so recent as Phillip Wagner v. Leser, 239 U. S. 207, 60 L. ed. 230, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 66, and Houck v. Little River Drainage Dist. 239 U. S. 254, 60 L. ed. 266, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58, with the result that the rule as we have stated it was approved, with the qualification, which was before implied, that the legislative determination can be assailed under the 14th Amendment only where the legislative action is "arbitrary, wholly unwarranted," "a flagrant abuse, and by reason of its arbitrary character a confiscation of particular property." And see Withnell v. Ruecking Constr. Co. 249 U. S. 63, 69, 63 L. ed. 479, 39

The decisions relied upon by the Company (Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187; Myles Salt Co. v. Iberia & St. M. Drainage Dist. 239 U. S. 478, 60 L. ed. 392, L.R.A.1918E, 190, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204; Gast Realty & Invest. Co. v. Schneider Granite Co. 240 U. S. 55, 60 L. ed. 523, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 254) are not in conflict with the rule, but plainly fall within, and are illustrations of, the qualification of it.

An application of this rule to the case before us renders not difficult the decision of the second assignment of error.

The road to be improved was "a little less than 3½ miles in length," and extended from Alma, a considerable village, on the north, southerly to an east and west road which had its western terminus at the city of Van Buren, 8 miles west of the junction of the two roads. It was the principal road to and from Alma, the travel on it being greater than on all the other roads which served that village combined. In wet seasons the road was practically impassable for wagons, sometimes for three or four months together. People living south of the east and west road, who made Van Buren their trading point in wet weather, after the road was improved traded exclusively at Alma, it being 4½ miles nearer for many of them. The railway of the appellee was the only [191] one at Alma, but at Van Buren there was a competing road, with a line 250 miles shorter than that of the appellee to St. Louis, the chief market for the staples of the region.

On the question of benefits which would come to the railroad property from the construction of the road, the appellee receiver called four witnesses, three of them engineers and one a superintendent of the company. Two of these were familiar with the location of the road and the other two testified that they knew of its location in a general way. All four testified in general terms that the road was not and never would be of any benefit to the railroad. It is significant that no traffic man was called, and that no evidence was introduced showing the extent of business done at Alma before and after the improvement of the road.

For the District, three witnesses were called, one a doctor, one a merchant, and one a long-time resident of the village of Alma. Each of these testified that, in his opinion, the road, by making the village of Alma more accessible, particularly in the wet seasons of the year, and by developing the adjacent country, would increase the business of the railway company, and would divert business from Van Buren, where there was a competing railroad, to Alma, where appellee had the only line. It was in evidence also that after the act was passed, but before the road was completed, a large gas-producing district was discovered not far south of the southern terminus of the improved road, which was tributary to it.

To this must be added the obvious fact that anything that develops the territory which a railroad serves must necessarily be of benefit to it, and that no agency for such development equals that of good roads.

This discussion of the record makes it clear that it is impossible to characterize as arbitrary, capricious, or confiscatory the action of the general assembly in declaring [192] that the property of the railroad company within the District would be benefited by the construction of the contemplated road improvement, but, on the contrary, it makes it apparent that the case is one so fully within the general rule that the holding of the circuit court of appeals that the railroad would not be benefited by the improvement cannot be sustained.

It results that the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals must be reversed, and that of the District Court affirmed.

Reversed.

[No. 51.]

Argued October 24, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Kentucky to review a decree enjoining the enforcement of a municipal ordinance fixing water rates. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Smith Hays argued the cause, and, with Messrs. J. Smith Hays, Jr., John M. Stevenson, James F. Winn, and F. H. Haggard, filed a brief for appellants:

The city is clothed with authority to fix rates by the language of Kentucky Statutes, § 3490, subsection 25, and the other subsections show that it was the plain legislative intent to bestow such power.

Owensboro v. Owensboro Waterworks Co. 191 U. S. 358, 48 L. ed. 217, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 82; 37 Cyc. 604.

The language of the court of appeals of Kentucky, cited by the district court, relative to charters of cities of the third and fourth class in Kentucky, is dictum.

United Fuel & Gas Co. v. Com. 159 Ky. 34, 166 S. W. 783.

Mr. Beverley R. Jouett argued the cause, and, with Messrs. James M. Benton and Stephen T. Davis, filed a brief for appellee:

The board of council of the city of Winchester had no authority on June 2, 1916, to pass the ordinance fixing the rates which water companies would be permitted to charge for water furnished the city and its citizens, because the legislature of Kentucky had not granted such authority to the city.

Memphis, 119 C. C. A. 73, 200 Fed. 657.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

The Winchester Water Works Company filed its bill in the United States district court for the eastern district of Kentucky, seeking to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance establishing maximum rates for water to be furnished the city for public use and to the people thereof for private use. By the bill and amended bill it was charged that the city had no authority to pass or enforce an ordinance fixing such rates, because (1) no power had been granted to the city so to do by the legislature of Kentucky; (2) because the rates established were so low as to be confiscatory in their character, and, consequently, the ordinance was violative of rights secured to the company by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. An answer was filed, and the court decided the case and made a final decree in favor of the company upon the ground that, under the laws of Kentucky, the city had no authority to pass or enforce an ordinance fixing rates. The court found it unnecessary to pass upon the question of the confiscatory character of the rates. The bill invoked jurisdiction upon a constitutional ground, and the case was brought here by direct appeal.

It appears that the company had a contract with the city, which expired in 1916, and thereafter the ordinance in controversy was passed. That a city has no power to regulate rates of this character unless it has legislative authority so to do is established, and does not seem to be disputed by the appellant. "Independently of a right to regulate and control the rates to be charged for public service reserved in a grant of a franchise or right to use the city streets, a city or other municipality has no power to regulate the rates to be charged by water, lighting, or [194] other public service corporations in the absence of express or plain legislative authority to do so." 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1325. Nor does such authority arise from the power to regulate the opening and use of streets, nor a grant of the general right to control and regulate the right to erect works and lay pipes in the streets of the city. State ex rel. Garner v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. 189 Mo. 83, 88 S. W. 41; Jacksonville v. Southern Bell Teleph. Co. 57 Fla. 374, 49 So. 509; Lewisville Natural Gas Co. v. State, 135 Ind. 49, 21 L.R.A. 734, 34 N. E. 702; Mills v. Chicago, 127 Fed. 731; State ex rel. Wisconsin v. Cheyboygan, 111 Wis. 23, 86 N. W. 657.

Bearing this general principle in mind, we come to examine the sections of the laws of Kentucky which, it is insisted, give the authority to fix water rates. The appellant insists that this power is expressly conferred in subsection 25 of § 3490 of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "The board of council may grant the right of way over the public streets or public grounds of the city to any railroad company or street railroad company, on such conditions as to them may seem proper, and shall have a supervising control over the use of the same, and regulate the speed of cars and signals and fare on street cars; and under like condition and supervision may grant the right of way that may be necessary to gas companies, water companies, electric light companies, telephone companies, or any like companies; and may compel any railroad company to erect and maintain gates at any or all street crossings, and to prevent railways from blocking or obstructing the streets or public ways of the city, and to fix penalties for the violation of these provisions: provided, etc."

Other subsections claimed to be applicable are given in the margin.[1]

[195] Examining subsection 25, we are unable to discover any grant of authority to fix the rates for water consumption. It is therein first provided that the council may grant the right of way over the public streets to any rail-

[1] Kentucky Statutes:

"3490. The board of council, in addition to other powers herein granted, shall have power within the city:

"(8) To provide the city with water, or erect, purchase or lease waterworks and maintain same, or to make all necessary contracts with any person or corporation for such purposes; to erect hydrants, cisterns, fire plugs and pumps in the streets within or beyond the limits of the city.

"(30) The board of council shall have power, by ordinance, to prescribe the punishment, by fine, not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding sixty days, of any person who shall molest, damage or interfere with any system of waterworks laid in said city, or the pipes and mains, hydrants, or any part thereof, and shall have power to punish by ordinance and impose the same penalty as for damaging or molesting any other public property, and may, subject to the rules of any water company which may establish such system, select persons who shall have the right to open, tap, or make connection with such pipes or mains in the streets, alleys, or public ways of said city.

"(33) Said city council shall have legislative power to make by-laws and ordinances for the carrying into effect of all of the powers herein granted for the government of the city, and to do all things properly belonging to the police of incorporated cities. Said board of council may change the boundary line of any ward or wards of any city now divided into wards, or hereafter divided into wards, under the provision of this act, not less than sixty days previous to any November election."

road or street railroad company on such conditions as to the council may seem proper, and shall have a supervising control over the use of the same, and the council is given the right to regulate the speed of cars and signals and fare on street cars, and under like conditions and supervision, the council may grant the right of way to water companies among others. This language is certainly very far from that express authority to regulate rates, which is essential in order to enable municipalities so to do. The power to grant a right of way to water companies is specifically granted, and this under like conditions and supervision already provided as to railroad and street [196] railroad companies. This is the full measure of the grant of authority to deal with water companies. The right to regulate fares is in the same sentence which grants authority to deal with water companies, and is specifically limited to fares on street cars.

Nor do we find in other subsections of this section any provision from which the right to fix the rates of water companies can be inferentially deduced.

Counsel call to our attention but one case from Kentucky, whose court of last resort is final authority upon the construction of the statutes, and that is United Fuel & Gas Co. v. Com. 159 Ky. 34, 166 S. W. 783. There the United Fuel & Gas Company held a franchise from a city in Kentucky under an ordinance providing that the grantee of the franchise should furnish for public and private use for the city and its inhabitants natural and artificial gas at a reasonable price not exceeding in any event $1 per 1,000 cubic feet, and that the grantee, in delivering gas, should not discriminate against the consumers in the city. The company proposed to sell gas to the inhabitants of the city at 20 cents per thousand feet if they would sign a contract for five years, but it charged persons who did not sign such a contract 25 cents a thousand feet. The city council passed an ordinance providing that a gas company should not charge one citizen more than another, and imposed a fine for violation of the ordinance. The city was of the fifth class, and was given authority to make "all other local police, sanitary, and other regulations, not conflicting with the general laws." The court held that the act for the government of this city of the fifth class must be read in connection with the statutes conferring power on larger cities, and that, thus construed, there was no grant of authority to the city to impose a fine such as the one in question in the absence of legislative authority so to do. The section from Dillon on Municipal Corporations, [197] stating that the authority of a municipality to regulate rates to be charged by public service corporations is limited to cases in which express or plain legislative authority has been given, was quoted with approval. Cases from other states in which the principle has been approved were also cited.

It is true that this case is not precisely in point, but it contains a recognition by the court of appeals of Kentucky of the accepted principle that the right to fix rates must be granted to municipal corporations by a plain expression of legislative authority. It is said, however, that our decision in Owensboro v. Owensboro Waterworks Co. 191 U. S. 358, 48 L. ed. 217, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 82, holds a contrary view. So far as apposite, that case dealt with the power of a city of the third class to fix rates for water consumers. As to cities of that class, § 3290 of the Kentucky Statutes specifically provides authority to provide the city and inhabitants thereof with water, light, etc., service by contract or by works of its own, and to make regulations for the management thereof, and to fix and regulate the price to consumers and customers. Dealing with that section, and the authority conferred upon cities of the third class, this court said: "The purpose of § 3290 was to provide the inhabitants of cities of the third class with the services mentioned, —water, light, power, heat, and telephone. They could be provided by the cities directly, or they could be provided by private persons; but whatever way provided, the power was given to regulate the management and fix the rates of the services, and this was but the endowment of a common governmental power."

This language was used in regard to the authority given in express terms to fix rates. It was said of such authority that it was but the endowment of a common governmental power. This is undoubtedly true. But it is equally certain that the governmental power rests with the state, and must be conferred upon the municipality [198] in an unmistakable way. We find nothing in the Owensboro Case which at all conflicts with the construction which we have given to § 3490, applicable to cities of the fourth class, to which the city of Winchester belongs.

Finding no error in the judgment of the District Court, the same is affirmed.

v.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — empty mail bags.

1. There is nothing to prevent Congress, when fixing compensation for the carriage of the mails, from directing, as it did in the Act of May 27, 1908, that the empty mail bags shall be withdrawn from the mails and be transported by freight or express, the effect of which is to reduce the compensation for carrying the mails by excluding the weight of the empty bags in determining the average weight of the mails as the basis of fixing compensation.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying the mails — empty mail bags — land-grant railroads.

2. Congress, by directing, as it did in the Act of May 27, 1908, that empty mail bags be withdrawn from the mails and be transported by freight or express, thereby brought such bags when carried by freight on a land-grant-aided railway within the provision of the Land-Grant Acts that all property and troops of the United States shall be transported at the railway company's expense, although by a wholly separate provision it was declared that the mails should be transported over the railway company's lines at such prices as Congress might direct, and the price was later fixed by Congress at 80 per cent of the compensation that would otherwise have been received.

Argued November 12, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment dismissing the petition of a railway company for compensation for the carriage of empty mail bags. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 45.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin Carter argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant:

The words in the land-grant statutes, relating to passenger and freight transportation, which define the subject of transportation free of charge, or at less rates than those established by the ordinary tariffs, are to be construed strictly.

When a statute, not clear upon its face, is to be interpreted, courts will consult the legislative reports and debates for expressions or indications of the legislature's intention.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Craft, 237 U. S. 648, 59 L. ed. 1160, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 704, 9 N. C. C. A. 754; Tap Line Cases (United States v. Louisiana & P. R. Co.), 234 U. A statute, although in clear terms, is not to be interpreted in a way to produce results manifestly unjust or absurd.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents questions arising upon a suit brought by the railway company in the court of claims to recover compensation for the carriage of mail bags under facts found in the court of claims in the record sent up for our consideration. These facts are: That the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, operated a line of railway between Tower Grove, Missouri, and Texarkana, in Arkansas. So much of the railway line as lies between Poplar Bluff, Missouri, and Texarkana, Arkansas, was aided in its construction by a grant of land from the United States by the Act of February 9, 1853 (10 Stat. at L. 155, chap. 59), and by the Act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 338, chap. 300).

The 4th section of the Act of February 9, 1853, provides:

"The said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

The 1st section of the Act of July 28, 1866, with respect to said railway, provides:

"All property and troops of the United States shall at all times be transported over said railroad and branches at the cost, charge, and expense of the company or corporation owning or operating said road and branches respectively, when so required by the government of the United States."

February 4, 1910, the Postoffice Department transmitted to the claimant company a distance circular which [203] relates to mail transportation; the same was duly filled out and certified and returned to the Postoffice Department. Between the 17th of February and the 1st day of June, 1910, the Postoffice Department made the quadrennial weighing of mail in the weighing division which included the railway company's lines. Before this weighing of the mails, Congress passed the Act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. 412, chap. 206), making appropriations for the Postoffice Department, which provides: "The Postmaster General shall require, when in freightable lots and whenever practicable, the withdrawal from the mails of all postal cards, stamped envelops, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, in the respective weighing divisions of the country, immediately preceding the weighing period in said divisions, and thereafter said postal cards, stamped envelops, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, shall be transmitted by either freight or express."

Subsequent to the passage of the Act of May 27, 1908, the Postoffice Appropriation Acts provided for specific sums for the payment of expressage on postal cards, stamped envelops, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail bags, and they carried similar provisions as to the withdrawal of said articles from the mails preceding weighing periods.

Before the weighing of the mails of the railway company the Postmaster General, acting under authority of the provisions of the Act of 1908, withdrew from the mail the empty mail bags, and the same were thereafter transported by freight over claimant's line of railway, and the weights were not included in estimating the weight of the mail carried during the contract term beginning July 1, 1910.

The findings give the number of pounds of empty mail [204] bags withdrawn from the mails during the weighing season of 1910, and sent by freight to St. Louis from Texarkana, Arkansas, and Little Rock, Arkansas, and show that if these empty bags had not been so withdrawn and the weight thereof had been included with the weight of the mails, upon which compensation was based, the claimant would have received $15,296.82 more than it did receive for service performed between July 1, 1910, and February 1, 1912.

During the period from July 1, 1910, to and including January 31, 1912, a total of 1,452,271 pounds of empty mail bags was transported over the railroad of the claimant in freight trains from Texarkana, Arkansas, to St. Louis, Missouri, for which service the claimant submitted bills at the published tariff rate against the United States amounting in the aggregate to $14,043.17. In making settlement of these charges the Auditor for the Postoffice Department made a deduction for the entire charge for the services performed from Texarkana, Arkansas, to Poplar Bluff, Missouri, amounting to $8,251.45.

The 6th section of the Act of 1853 provides: "The United States mail shall at all times be transported on the said road and branches, under the direction of the Postoffice Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct."

And the 13th section of the Act of July 12, 1876 (19 Stat. at L. 78, chap. 179, Comp. Stat. § 7485, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 199), provides: "That railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only 80 per centum of the compensation authorized by this act."

The findings further state that ever since the passage of said last-mentioned act it has been the custom and practice of the Postoffice Department to pay all the railroads [205] whose construction was aided by grants of land from the United States 80 per centum of the rate of compensation paid to non-land-aided roads for carrying the mails.

Claimant presented its bill for the transportation of said freight at the full commercial rate provided by the duly published and approved tariffs. In making settlement therefor, the Postmaster General made deduction of the entire charge between Texarkana, Arkansas, and Poplar Bluff, Missouri, and refused to pay anything therefor, on the ground that the railway company was obliged by the provisions of the Acts of 1853 and 1866 to transport said empty mail bags without cost or expense to the United States.

Upon these findings the court of claims decided against the claimant, and dismissed its petition. 53 Ct. Cl. 45.

Two questions are presented, which are thus stated in the opinion of the court of claims:

"(1) Could the empty mail bags be lawfully withdrawn from the mails merely for the purpose of reducing claimant's compensation for mail transportation service?

"(2) And assuming that said empty mail bags were lawfully withdrawn from the mails and shipped by freight, were they 'property' of the United States within the purview of the Land Grant Acts of 1853 and 1866?"

As to the first question there can be little difficulty. There was nothing in any law or contract of the government which required it to permit the weighing of empty sacks or containers as part of the mail in determining the compensation to be paid for carrying the same. While, generally speaking, a bag or container in which letters or other mailable matter is carried is part of the mail, and collectively the containers might be considered as part of the mail essential to carry the mailable matter from one place to another, nevertheless there was nothing to prevent Congress, in fixing compensation for the carriage of the mails, to expressly withdraw therefrom the empty [206] mail bags, and this it did by the Act of May 27, 1908, above quoted.

For the purposes of fixing compensation in the weighing of the mail Congress directed that the weight of the empty bags should be withheld in determining the average weight of the mails as the basis of fixing compensation. We agree with the court of claims that such action violated no contractual or other right of the claimant.

Concerning the other question presented there is perhaps more difficulty. By the 6th section of the Act of 1853 it was directed that the United States mail should be transported over the claimant's road at such prices as Congress may by law direct, and by the 13th section of the Act of July 12, 1876, railroads aided by grants of land made by Congress on condition that Congress should fix the basis of compensation for transportation of mails over its lines should receive 80 per centum of the compensation provided for in the act. These acts make specific reference to the amounts to be paid for the transportation of the mails. The payment provided in them is for the transportation of the mails, which, it may be conceded, might include with the mail-matter the bags in which the same was carried. However, by the Act of May 27, 1908, the Congress has classified empty mail bags with furniture and equipment and other supplies for the postal service, to be transported by freight or express. Congress thus undertook to make a separate provision covering the carrying of empty mail containers after they had served their purpose of inclosing the mail-matter during transportation.

It is insisted that the return of the empty mail bags is but part of the transportation of the mail. But certainly Congress might provide that empty mail bags should be differently treated than those used in the actual transportation of mailable matter. None will dispute that forwarding mail bags from their place of manufacture to [207] different points in the country for use would not constitute transportation of mail. We see no reason why Congress may not regard empty mail bags, being returned for further use, as no longer a part of the mails. Congress authorized contracts for the transportation of the mail, but, by the Act of May 27, 1908, it withdrew empty mail bags from mail transportation and directed that they be sent by freight or express. How, then, was such transportation to be compensated? Ordinarily the applicable freight or express rates would control. But the acts of Congress which provided that property of the United States should be transported at the expense of the company were in full force and effect. It is said that in the report and action upon the legislation which took empty mail bags from carriage as part of the mails and directed the carriage by freight or express there is no intimation that the result of such legislation would have the effect of obtaining free transportation under the Land Grant Acts, and that no such requirement is made in the act itself. But Congress must be presumed to have known of its former legislation in the Acts of 1853 and 1866, and to have passed the new laws in view of the provisions of the legislation already enacted. These statutes must be construed together and effect given to all of them. Under the earlier acts this railroad, in consideration of benefits received, was bound, when required, to transport troops and property of the United States free of charge.

We have here a question concerning the transportation of property of the United States. See Southern P. Co. v. United States, 237 U. S. 202, 204, 59 L. ed. 916, 917, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573. The act of Congress providing for 50 per cent rates concerns only "army" transportation, and is not applicable to this case. See Act of June 30, 1882 (22 Stat. at L. 120, chap. 254; 1 Rev. Stat. Supp. pp. 375, 376). The empty mail bags were property, and belonged to the United States. When the government required their transportation by freight, the former legislation which accompanied [208] the grant of lands to this railway company controlled the terms of carriage.

We find no error in the judgment of the Court of Claims, which was also the conclusion of the Comptroller of the Treasury (17 Comp. Dec. 749).

Affirmed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds, dissenting:

Appellant's right to recover seems quite plain to me.

The Act of February 9, 1853, chap. 59, 10 Stat. at L. 155, granted lands afterwards used to aid in constructing appellant's lines. Section 4: ". . . The said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States." Section 6: "That the United States mail shall at all times be transported on the said road and branches, under the direction of the Postoffice Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct."

The Act of July 28, 1866, chap. 300, 14 Stat. at L. 338, among other things, revived and extended the Act of 1853. Section 1: ". . . And provided further, That all property and troops of the United States shall at all times be transported over said railroad and branches at the cost, charge, and expense of the company or corporation owning or operating said road and branches respectively, when so required by the government of the United States."

And thus it appears that one section of the statutes directs free transportation of "all property and troops of the United States," and a wholly different section requires transportation of the United States mail "under the direction of the Postoffice Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct."

Through the Postoffice Department, the United States [209] are engaged in handling the mails for pay. Their transportation is part of a well-defined business. In the orderly course and as an essential part of that business emptied sacks are constantly being returned for further use. They are property of the United States in a certain sense, whether full or empty; and they are elements of the mail whether going out or coming back.

A clear distinction between property of the United States and United States mail is preserved by the very language of the Land Grant Statutes; and, I think, Congress had no purpose—if, indeed, the power—to convert mail into property within the meaning of these statutes simply by directing carriage of the former in freight trains. The purpose was to secure transportation at less than former cost, and to such end Congress, in effect, commanded that emptied bags, a portion of the mails for which rapid movement is not essential, "shall be transmitted by either freight or express," and compensation made according to the ordinary rates. Under this interpretation, the railroad would suffer no oppressive burden and contemplated economies would be effectuated.

Statutes — construction — general terms.

1. Where several words in a statute are followed by a general expression which is as much applicable to the first and other words as to the last, that expression is not limited to the last, but applies to all.

[For other cases, see Statutes, II. f, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

War — war-time prohibition — manufacture of nonintoxicating beer.

2. The use of grains, cereals, fruit, or other food products in the manufacture and production of beer for beverage purposes, which, while containing as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by weight and volume, is not alleged to be intoxicating, was not prohibited by the provisions of the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918, that to conserve the nation's man power and to increase efficiency in the production of war essentials no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food products shall, after May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the war and until demobilization is proclaimed by the President, be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes. A different conclusion is not demanded because of Treasury Department rulings that all beer containing ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol is taxable, or of the determination of the Internal Revenue Department that a beverage containing that amount of alcohol is to be regarded as intoxicating within the intendment of the act.

Statutes — executive construction.

3. Administrative rulings cannot add to the terms of an act of Congress and make conduct criminal which such law leaves untouched.

Statutes — construction — favoring constitutionality.

4. A congressional enactment must be construed, if fairly possible, so as to avoid not only the conclusion that it was unconstitutional, but also grave doubts upon that score.

[For other cases, see Statutes, II. a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Evidence — judicial notice — intoxicating character of liquor.

5. The Federal Supreme Court cannot say as a matter of law that a beverage containing not more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Solicitor General King and Assistant Attorney General Frierson argued the cause and filed a brief for the United States in No. 458:

Clearly the intention was to prohibit all beverages which are commonly known as beer. The courts of the various states have almost uniformly given this construction to similar language.

Mr. William L. Marbury argued the cause, and, with Messrs. William L. Rawls and Randolph Barton, Jr., filed a brief for the Standard Brewery:

Congress only intended to deal with malt and vinous liquors, by whatever name they might be called, when they met the two conditions specified, viz.: when they were intoxicating and when they were manufactured for beverage purposes. The language used is so clear that it is scarcely capable of any elucidation. The interpretation which is here placed upon it is that which the mind naturally gives it, without any effort, and the one which a critical examination of the text of the statute confirms.

The averments that the defendant "did unlawfully use certain grains," etc., and that that was "contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," etc., are mere conclusions of the pleader, and not facts, and, therefore, are of no avail.

United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 558, 23 L. ed. 588, 593; Re Greene, 52 Fed. 111; United States v. Carney, 228 Fed. 165.

Since it is well-established law that where facts alleged are susceptible of two interpretations, one of which points to guilt and the other to innocence, a court of justice has no alternative, it must pronounce in favor of innocence, it follows that it must be presumed that the half per cent beer referred to in the indictment was nonintoxicating. Certainly the courts cannot judicially know what particular percentage of alcohol will render a given kind of beer intoxicating. Indeed, it would be far more reasonable to ask the court to take judicial cognizance of the indisputable fact that half of 1 per cent beer is not, as a matter of fact, intoxicating.

Effect must, if possible, be accorded to every word in the statute. Such a word as "other" cannot be treated as superfluous, void, or insignificant. Its use must be assumed, if possible, to indicate a definite purpose on the part of Congress.

The mere fact that the words "beer" and "wine" do not serve any separate purpose that would not be comprehended within the phrase "intoxicating malt or vinous liquor" does not warrant the disregard of the word "other."

Intoxicating liquors are those liquors which are intended for use as, or capable of being used as, a beverage, and which contain alcohol in such proportion or per cent that when consumed in the quantity which may practically be drunk by an ordinary man, or in any quantity which the human stomach will ordinarily hold, will produce a condition commonly known as intoxication or drunkenness. Drunkenness or intoxication is a materially abnormal mental or physical condition, manifesting itself in the loss of the ordinary control of the mental faculties or bodily functions to an appreciable or material extent.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

These causes are here under the Criminal Appeals Act, March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. at L. 1246, chap. 2564, Comp. Stat. § 1704, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 149), and require the construction of the so-called "War-time Prohibition [215] Act," of November 21, 1918 (chap. 212, 40 Stat. at L. 1045–1047, Comp. Stat. § 3115 11/12f).

In No. 458 the Standard Brewing Company was indicted for unlawfully using certain grains, cereals, fruit, and other food products on the 4th of June, 1919, in the manufacture and production of beer for beverage purposes which, it is charged, contained as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by both weight and volume. In No. 474 the American Brewing Company was indicted for the like use on the 26th day of June, 1919, of certain grains, cereals, and food products in the manufacture and production of beer containing a like percentage of alcohol.

In the indictment in No. 474 it was charged that at the time of the alleged offense the termination of demobilization had not been determined and proclaimed by the President.

In each case a demurrer was sustained by the district court.

Before considering the construction of that portion of the act involved in these cases it will be helpful to give a short history of the preceding legislation that led up to it. The Food Control Act of August 10, 1917 (40 Stat. at L. chap. 53, pp. 276, 282, Comp. Stat. § 3115½e, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 181), authorized the President to prescribe and give public notice of limitations, regulations, or prohibitions respecting the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feed, in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, including regulations for the reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, and promote the national security and defense. Whenever notice should be given and remain unrevoked no person, after a reasonable time prescribed in such notice, could use any food, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or import any such liquors except under license and in compliance with lawfully prescribed rules and regulations. Under the [216] authority thus conferred, the President issued various proclamations. On December 8, 1917 [40 Stat. at L. 84], he issued one forbidding the production of all malt liquor, except ale and porter, containing more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight. On September 16, 1918 [40 Stat. at L. 204], he issued a second proclamation, prohibiting after December 1, 1918, the production of malt liquors, including near beer, for beverage purposes, whether or not such malt liquors contained alcohol. On January 30, 1919 [40 Stat. at L. 286], he issued a third proclamation which modified the others to the extent of permitting the use of grain in the manufacture of nonintoxicating beverages, it being recited therein that the prohibition of the use of grain in the manufacture of such beverages had been found no longer essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food. And on March 4, 1919 [40 Stat. at L. 293], he issued a fourth proclamation amending his proclamation of September 16, 1918, so as to prohibit the production only of intoxicating malt liquors for beverage purposes.

It thus appears that the President, acting under the Act of August 10, 1917, has reduced the prohibition of the use of food materials so that now it is limited to the manufacture of such liquors as are in fact intoxicating.

In the light of all this action we come to consider the proper construction of so much of the Act of November 21, 1918, as is here involved, which provides:

"That after June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and nineteen, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the nation, and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for [217] beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After May first, nineteen hundred and nineteen, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and nineteen, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export."

Nothing is better settled than that, in the construction of a law, its meaning must first be sought in the language employed. If that be plain, it is the duty of the courts to enforce the law as written, provided it be within the constitutional authority of the legislative body which passed it. Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 670, 671, 32 L. ed. 1060, 1063, 1064, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 651; Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Sulzberger, 157 U. S. 1, 33, 39 L. ed. 601, 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; United States v. First Nat. Bank, 234 U. S. 245, 258, 58 L. ed. 1298, 1303, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846; Caminetti v. United States, 242 U. S. 470, 485, 61 L. ed. 442, 452, L.R.A.1917F, 502, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1168. Looking to the act, we find these are its declared purposes: (1) To conserve the man power of the nation; (2) to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, and food and clothing for the Army and Navy. To these ends it is made illegal to sell distilled spirits for beverage purposes or to remove the same from bond for such purposes except for export. And after May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the war, and until demobilization is proclaimed by the President, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food products are permitted to be used in the manufacture or production of [218] beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes.

The prohibitions extend to the use of food products for making "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes." These provisions are of plain import and are aimed only at intoxicating beverages. It is elementary that all of the words used in a legislative act are to be given force and meaning (Washington Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112, 115, 25 L. ed. 782, 783); and of course the qualifying words "other intoxicating" in this act cannot be rejected. It is not to be assumed that Congress had no purpose in inserting them, or that it did so without intending that they should be given due force and effect. The government insists that the intention was to include beer and wine, whether intoxicating or not. If so, the use of this phraseology was quite superfluous, and it would have been enough to have written the act without the qualifying words.

This court had occasion to deal with a question very similar in character in the case of the United States v. United Verde Copper Co. 196 U. S. 207, 49 L. ed. 449, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222, where an act permitted the use of timber on the public lands for building, agricultural, mining, and other domestic purposes, and held that we could not disregard the use of the word "other," notwithstanding the contention that it should be eliminated from the statute in order to ascertain the true meaning. So here, we think it clear that the framers of the statute intentionally used the phrase "other intoxicating" as relating to and defining the immediately preceding designation of beer and wine. "As a matter of ordinary construction, where several words are followed by a general expression as here, whicIf is as much applicable to the first and other words as to the last, that expression is not limited to the last, but applies to all." Lord Bramwell in Great Western R. Co. v. Swindon & C. Extension R. Co. L. R. 9 App. Cas. 787, 808.

[219] The declared purpose of Congress was to conserve the nation's man power and increase efficiency in producing war essentials; and it accordingly undertook to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors whose use might interfere with the consummation of that purpose. Other provisions of the act lend support to this view. The sale and withdrawal from bond of distilled spirits (always intoxicating) were declared unlawful after June 30th, 1919, —their manufacture had already been prohibited. The sale of beer, wine, and other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors was prohibited after the same date, and the importation of all such liquors and also of distilled liquors was made immediately unlawful. The President was empowered at once to establish zones about coal mines, manufactories, shipbuilding plants, etc., etc., and "to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones."

The fact that the Treasury Department may have declared taxable under many revenue acts all beer containing ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol is not important. Such rulings did not turn upon the intoxicating character of the liquid, but upon classification for taxation controlled by other considerations. A liquid may be designated as beer and subjected to taxation although clearly nonintoxicating. "The question whether a fermented malt liquor is intoxicating or nonintoxicating is immaterial under the Internal Revenue Laws, although it may be a very material question under the prohibitory laws of a state or under local ordinances." T. D. 804.

As to the insistence that the Internal Revenue Department has determined that a beverage containing ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol should be regarded as intoxicating within the intendment of the act before us, little need be said. Nothing in the act remits the determination of that question to the decision of the revenue officers of the government. While entitled to respect, [220] as such decisions are, they cannot enlarge the meaning of a statute enacted by Congress. Administrative rulings cannot add to the terms of an act of Congress and make conduct criminal which such laws leave untouched. Waite v. Macy, 246 U. S. 606, 62 L. ed. 892, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 395; United States v. George, 228 U. S. 14, 22, 57 L. ed. 712, 715, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412; United States v. United Verde Copper Co. 196 U. S. 207, 215, 49 L. ed. 449, 452, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222.

Furthermore, we must remember, in considering an act of Congress, that a construction which might render it unconstitutional is to be avoided. We said in United States v. Jin Fuey Moy, 241 U. S. 394, 401, 60 L. ed. 1061, 1064, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 658: "A statute must be construed if fairly possible, so as to avoid not only the conclusion that it is unconstitutional, but also grave doubt upon that score." See also United States ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & H. Co. 213 U. S. 366, 53 L. ed. 836, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527. We held in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. decided December 15, 1919 [251 U. S. 146, ante, 194, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106], that the war power of Congress, as applied to the situation outlined in the opinion in that case, enabled it to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. But the question was neither made nor decided as to whether Congress could prohibit even in time of war the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating beverages.

An indictment must charge each and every element of an offense. Evans v. United States, 153 U. S. 584, 587, 38 L. ed. 830, 831, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 668. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that a beverage containing not more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol is intoxicating, and as neither indictment so charges, it follows that the courts below in each of the cases correctly construed the act of Congress, and the judgments are affirmed.

[221] UNITED STATES, Petitioner,
v.
WILLIAM B. POLAND and Frederick William Low.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 221-228.)

Public lands — soldiers' additional homestead rights — single body.

1. The prohibition in the Act of March 3, 1903, extending the Homestead Laws to Alaska, that not more than 160 acres of land shall be entered in a single body by means of soldiers' additional homestead rights, may not be evaded by a mere resort to two entries by the same person for two tracts separately surveyed, but contiguous to the extent of having a common boundary ½ mile in length, each containing 160 acres or less.

[For other cases, see Public Lands, I. c, 9, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Evidence — burden of proof — suit to cancel patent — bona fide purchase.

2. The defense that defendant in a suit by the Federal government to cancel a patent for public lands as issued in violation of law is a bona fide purchaser is an affirmative one, which he must set up and establish.

[For other cases, see Evidence, II. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 19, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Third Division of the District of Alaska, sustaining demurrers to and dismissing the bill in a suit by the United States to cancel a patent for public lands. Reversed.

See same case below, 145 C. C. A. 630, 231 Fed. 810.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Assistant Attorney General Nebeker argued the cause, and, with Solicitor General King, filed a brief for petitioner.

Mr. Ira Bronson argued the cause, and, with Mr. H. B. Jones, filed a brief for respondents.

Mr. George H. Patrick also argued the cause for respondents.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit to cancel a patent issued to William B. Poland for 160 acres of land in Alaska, the gravamen of the complaint being that by this and another patent, both based upon soldiers' additional homestead rights, Poland acquired a single body of land for larger acreage than was permitted by the statute under which the patents were sought and issued. The defendants, who were the patentee and another claiming under him, separately demurred to the complaint, and the court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the suit. That decision was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, one judge dissenting (145 C. C. A. 630, 231 Fed. 810), and the case is here on writ of certiorari.

Of course, it rested with Congress to determine whether, when, and with what restrictions, the General Land Laws should be extended to Alaska. For many years there was no affirmative action upon the subject. The first steps consisted of limited extensions of the laws relating to mining claims (Act of May 17, 1884) chap. 53, 23 Stat. at L. 24, § 8, Comp. Stat. § 5094, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 300), and townsites (Act of March 3, 1891, chap. 561, 26 [223] Stat. at L. 1095, § 11, Comp. Stat. § 5079, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 316), but with these we are not now concerned. The Homestead Laws were the next to receive attention. By the Act of May 14, 1898, chap. 299, 30 Stat. at L. 409, Comp. Stat. § 5083, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 330, they were extended to that district with the restrictions (a) that "no homestead" should exceed 80 acres in extent, and (b) that "no entry" should extend more than 80 rods along the shore of any navigable water, and along such shore a space of at least 80 rods should be reserved from entry between all such claims. And by the amendatory Act of March 3, 1903, chap. 1002, 32 Stat. at L. 1028, Comp. Stat. § 5046, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 326, the extension of the Homestead Laws was repeated and confirmed, but with the qualifications (a) that an actual settler intending to comply with the requirements in respect of continued residence, cultivation, etc., should be entitled to enter 320 acres or a less quantity, (b) that "no more than 160 acres shall be entered in any single body" by means of soldiers' additional homestead rights, and (c) that "no entry" should extend more than 160 rods along the shore of any navigable water, and along such shore a space of at least 80 rods should be reserved from entry between all such claims. Further restrictions were imposed, but there is no present need for noticing them.

The controversy here is over the meaning and purpose of the provision that no more than 160 acres shall be entered in any single body by means of soldiers' additional homestead rights.

The material facts to be gathered from the complaint are these: Poland, who was the assignee of certain soldiers' additional homestead rights entitling their owner to enter and acquire in the aggregate 319.75 acres, wished to use them in entering and acquiring certain land in Alaska. The regular public surveys had not been extended to that locality, so he caused a special survey of the land to be made at his expense, as was permitted by applicable [224] regulations. 32 Land Dec. 424; 28 Land Dec. 149. By that survey the land, which was in a compact or single body, was divided into two tracts,—one of 159.75 acres, designated as survey No. 241, and the other of 160 acres, designated as survey No. 242. As surveyed, the north boundary of one tract was the south boundary of the other, and this was shown in the surveyor's return. On April 26, 1906, after the survey, he presented at the local land office two applications whereby he sought to make separate entries of the two tracts with his soldiers' additional rights,—some of the rights being used on one tract and the others on the other tract. The applications were approved and passed to entry and patent,—the patent for the 160 acres being issued a considerable period after the other.

In these circumstances the complaint charges that the 319.75 acres, although surveyed in the form of two tracts, were but a single body of land in the sense of the provision in question; that the land officers, in passing both applications to entry and patent, acted upon a misconception of the law and of their authority, and that in consequence the later patent, whereby Poland's acquisition was made to exceed 160 acres in a single body, was issued in violation of law, and should be canceled.

The complaint also contains an allegation that that patent was fraudulently procured in that, among the proofs presented to the land officers, was an affidavit falsely representing, in effect, that the two tracts were more than 80 rods apart, when in truth they were adjoining tracts. But this allegation must be put out of view, first, because the words of the affidavit as set forth in the complaint do not sustain the pleader's conclusion as to what was represented, and, second, because the complaint makes it certain that the application and other entry papers clearly disclosed that the two tracts were contiguous to the extent of having a common boundary ½ mile in length.

[225] In approaching the consideration of the provision whose meaning and purpose are in question it is well to recall what soldiers' additional homestead rights are and what use could be made of them outside Alaska when the provision was adopted. They are rights to enter and acquire unappropriated nonmineral public land without settlement, residence, improvement, or cultivation, and without payment of any purchase price. They are not personal to the original beneficiaries, but are transferable at will, and the number that may be assigned to the same person is not limited. A single right is always for less, and generally much less, than 160 acres, but rights aggregating many times that number of acres may be and often are held by a single assignee. When the provision was adopted there were almost no restrictions upon the use of such rights outside Alaska. Indeed, the only restriction of any moment was one, uniformly respected, preventing the inclusion of more than 160 acres in a single entry. But the number of such entries that might be made by the same person was not restricted, nor was there any limitation upon the amount of land in a single body that might be entered in that way. Thus, an assignee having rights aggregating 640 acres could use them in entering that amount of land in a compact body 1 mile square, if only he did so through four entries of 160 acres each. And, if he had rights the aggregate of which was sufficient, he could in a like way enter a body of land 3 miles square or even an entire township. See Rev. Stat. §§ 2289, 2304, 2306, Comp. Stat. §§ 4530, 4592, 4594, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 543, 586, 588; Webster v. Luther, 163 U. S. 331, 41 L. ed. 179, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 963; Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. United States, 233 U. S. 236, 243, 58 L. ed. 936, 941, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507; Robinson v. Lundrigan, 227 U. S. 173, 178, 179, 57 L. ed. 468, 470, 471, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255; 3 Land Dec. 472; Re Boyce, 29 Land Dec. 599; Re O'Keefe, 29 Land Dec. 643; 30 Land Dec. 285; 31 Land Dec. 441; Kiehlbauch v. Simero, 32 Land Dec. 418; Re Olsen, 33 Land Dec. 225; 45 Land Dec. 236, 3d par.; General Circular of 1904, pp. 11, 26-28.

With this understanding of the circumstances in which [226] the provision was incorporated into the Act of 1903, extending the Homestead Laws to Alaska, we think the meaning and purpose of the provision are manifest. It is in form a proviso and says "no more than 160 acres shall be entered in any single body" by means of soldiers' additional homestead rights. A purpose to prevent the use of these rights in entering a large acreage in a single body hardly could be more plainly expressed. There is nothing in the provision indicating that it is concerned merely with what may be taken by a single entry; and to construe it in that way would make it practically useless, for a large acreage in a single body still could be taken by merely resorting to two or more entries. Besides, the amount of land that could be taken by a single entry had long been limited to 160 acres, and of course to say that no greater amount should be taken in a single body by a single entry would add nothing to that limitation. But the provision does not speak of a single entry, but only of the amount that may be "entered in any single body;" and if it is to have any real effect it must be construed according to the natural import of its words; that is to say, as limiting the amount of land in a compact or single body that may be entered by means of soldiers' additional homestead rights, whether the entering be by one or several entries. We conclude, therefore, that the provision, while leaving one who holds several rights free to exercise all of them and to make as many entries as his rights will sustain, prohibits him from using them to enter and acquire more than 160 acres in a compact or single body.

The court in Alaska regarded the provision as sufficiently like that relating to the area of placer mining claims (Rev. Stat. §§ 2330, 2331, Comp. Stat. §§ 4629, 4630, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 577, 579) to require that it be similarly construed. But we think there is a marked difference between the two provisions. That in the placer mining law says "no location" shall exceed a prescribed [227] area, and it means, as the statute otherwise shows, that no single location shall include more.

The circuit court of appeals was of opinion that "what the statute was seeking to protect was the shores of the navigable waters of Alaska, and not to prohibit the entry of a tract of more than 160 acres." In this the court apparently confused the present provision, which operates in the same way in all parts of Alaska, with another and wholly distinct provision, which relates only to entries along the shore. Their independence and the subjects to which they relate are best shown by quoting both in the order in which they appear in the statute, which we do:

And provided further "that no more than one hundred and sixty acres shall be entered in any single body by . . . soldier's additional homestead right."

Provided, "that no entry shall be allowed extending more than one hundred and sixty rods along the shore of any navigable water, and along such shore a space of at least eighty rods shall be reserved from entry between all such claims."

There is in this case no question as to what distance along the shore an entry may extend, or as to what space shall be reserved between claims along the shore, but only a question as to whether making separate entries of lands which, in point of contiguity and compactness, constitute a single body of 319.75 acres, is in contravention of the provision first quoted, where both entries are by the same person and are based upon soldiers' additional homestead rights. That question we answer in the affirmative for the reasons before indicated.

It follows that, if the facts be as alleged in the complaint, the second patent was issued in violation of law, and the government is entitled to demand that it be canceled, unless, as is asserted in the brief for the defendants, one of them is a bona fide purchaser. The complaint does not show that he is such, and the rule is that this is an [228] affirmative defense which he must set up and establish. Wright-Blodgett Co. v. United States, 236 U. S. 397, 403, 59 L. ed. 637, 640, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 339: Great Northern R. Co. v. Hower, 236 U. S. 702, 710, 59 L. ed. 798, 802, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465.

If the patent is canceled, Poland, or his assignee, will be free to exercise the rights with which the patent was obtained (see Re Cole, 6 Land Dec. 290, and Re Courtright, 6 Land Dec. 459), and also to ask repayment under the Act of June 16, 1880, chap. 244, 21 Stat. at L. 287, Comp. Stat. § 4595, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 601, of the fees and commissions paid to the land officers.

Decree reversed.

PRODUCERS TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
RAILROAD COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al.

Constitutional law — due process of law — rate regulation.

1. An oil pipe line constructed solely to carry oil for particular producers under strictly private contracts, and never devoted by its owner to public use, could not, by mere legislative fiat or by any regulating order of a state commission, be converted by a state into a public utility, nor its owner made a common carrier, since that would be taking private property for public use without just compensation, which no state can do consistently with the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Constitutional law — due process of law — rate regulation.

2. A corporation which has voluntarily devoted its oil pipe line to the use of the public may, consistently with due process of law, be subjected by a state to the regulatory powers of a state commission over the rates and practices of public utilities.

3. A common carrier cannot, by making contracts for future transportation or business, mortgaging its property or pledging its income, prevent or postpone the exertion by a state of the power to regulate the carrier's rates and practices, nor does the contract clause of the Federal Constitution interpose any obstacle to the exertion of such power.

Argued December 12, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California to review a judgment which affirmed an order of the state Railroad Commission, requiring a corporation operating an oil pipe line to file its schedule of rates or charges and the rules and regulations under which the transportation is conducted. Affirmed.

See same case below, 176 Cal. 499, P.U.R.1918B, 518, 169 Pac. 59.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. V. Andrews argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Lewis W. Andrews, Thomas O. Toland, and Paul M. Gregg, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Has the state of California plenary power which authorizes it, by constitutional declaration or legislative enactment, to impress upon a person or corporation in fact engaged in a private business, the obligations and character of a public utility, and by its mere fiat change property actually devoted solely to private use so that it becomes impressed with a public character and burden, without the exercise of the right of eminent domain and without compensation?

A state has the power to declare any business which is of public interest and concern to be a public utility and subject to regulation by the state, particularly when those conducting the business have devoted its property to public use; and the fact that the business is conducted through contracts does not preclude such regulation.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court:

We here are concerned with a statute of California and an order made thereunder by the state Railroad Commission, both of which are said to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore invalid.

The statute declares that every private corporation or individual operating "any pipe line, or any part of any pipe line . . . for the transportation of crude oil . . . , directly or indirectly, to or for the public, for hire, . . . and which said pipe line . . . is constructed or maintained upon, along, over or under any public highway, and in favor of whom the right of eminent domain exists," shall be deemed a common carrier and subject to the provisions of a prior act investing the Railroad Commission with extensive powers over the rates and practices of those who operate public utilities. Stat. 1913, chap. 327; Stat. 1911, Ex. Sess. chap. 14.

The order of the Commission was made after notice and [230] a full hearing; is based upon a finding that the Producers Transportation Company, the plaintiff in error, has a pipe line from the San Joaquin oil fields to Port Harford, on the Pacific coast, whereby it transports crude oil for pay in such circumstances that the statute requires that it be regarded and dealt with as a common carrier; and directs the filing with the Commission of the company's schedule of rates or charges and the rules and regulations under which the transportation is conducted.

In the state court the company contended that the evidence before the Commission, all of which was before the court, conclusively established that the pipe line was constructed solely to carry crude oil for particular producers from their wells to the seacoast under strictly private contracts, and that there had been no carrying for others, nor any devotion of the pipe line to public use; and the company further contended that the statute, as applied to this pipe line, was repugnant to the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment and the contract clause of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution, and that the order of the Commission was void as offending against these clauses. The state court sustained both the statute and the order (176 Cal. 499, P.U.R.1918B, 518, 169 Pac. 59), and the company sued out this writ of error.

The company was organized under the laws of California in 1909 and its pipe line was put in operation in 1910. The statute in question took effect August 10, 1913, and the order was made December 31, 1914.

It is, of course, true that if the pipe line was constructed solely to carry oil for particular producers under strictly private contracts, and never was devoted by its owner to public use, that is, to carrying for the public, the state could not, by mere legislative fiat or by any regulating order of a commission, convert it into a public utility or make its owner a common carrier; for that would be taking private property for public use without just compensation, [231] which no state can do consistently with the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment. On the other hand, if in the beginning or during its subsequent operation the pipe line was devoted by its owner to public use, and if the right thus extended to the public has not been withdrawn, there can be no doubt that the pipe line is a public utility and its owner a common carrier whose rates and practices are subject to public regulation. Munn v. Illinois, supra.

The state court, upon examining the evidence, concluded that the company voluntarily had devoted the pipe line to the use of the public in transporting oil, and it rested this conclusion upon the grounds, first, that one of the things which the company was authorized to do, if it so elected, as shown in its articles of incorporation, was "to establish and carry on . . . a general transportation business for the purpose of transporting . . . any of the oils . . . produced . . . by this corporation or any other person, firm, partnership, association, or corporation;" second, that in acquiring its right of way it resorted to an exercise of the power of eminent domain,—admissible only if the condemnation was for a "public use" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1237, 1238), and was by "an agent of the state" (Civ. Code, § 1001),—and in that proceeding asserted, and obtained a judgment reciting, that it was engaged in transporting oil by pipe line "as a common carrier for hire," and that the right of way was sought for "a public use;" and, third, that, looking [232] through the maze of contracts, agency agreements, and the like, under which the transportation was effected, subordinating form to substance, and having due regard to the agency's ready admission of new members and its exclusion of none, it was apparent that the company did in truth carry oil for all producers seeking its service; in other words, for the public. See Pipe Line Cases (United States v. Ohio Oil Co.) 234 U. S. 548, 58 L. ed. 1459, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 956.

While some criticism is made of this conclusion and the grounds upon which it is rested, we are of opinion that the grounds have adequate support in the evidence and that they sustain the conclusion. True, one witness stated that "the pipe line was not laid upon the right of way which was obtained in the condemnation suit;" but, as his further testimony disclosed that he meant only that a part of the right of way so obtained was not used when the pipe line was laid, we think the state court rightly regarded the company as having acquired some of its actual right of way by exercising the power of eminent domain as a common carrier. If it was a common carrier at the time of the condemnation suit, it is such now, for nothing has occurred in the meantime to change its status.

That some of the contracts before mentioned were entered into before the statute was adopted or the order made is not material. A common carrier cannot, by making contracts for future transportation, or by mortgaging its property or pledging its income, prevent or postpone the exertion by the state of the power to regulate the carrier's rates and practices. Nor does the contract clause of the Constitution interpose any obstacle to the exertion of that power. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cutts) 94 U. S. 155, 162, 24 L. ed. 94, 95; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 482, 55 L. ed. 297, 303, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 671, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 265; Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Pub. [233] WILLIAM F. HAYS, Appt.,
v.
PORT OF SEATTLE, the State of Washington, et al.

Pleading — jurisdictional averments — — Federal question.

1. Averments of a bill setting up alleged obligations of a contract between claimant and the state, and the contention that they were impaired by subsequent legislation, presented a controversy under the Federal Constitution and conferred jurisdiction (a sufficient amount being involved) upon a Federal district court irrespective of the citizenship of the parties.

[For other cases, see Pleading, 321-353, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Error to district court — Federal question — impairing contract obligations.

2. The question whether the obligations of a contract with the state were impaired by subsequent state legislation is one which will warrant a direct writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court to a district court.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, 938-989, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — impairing contract obligations — repudiating contract.

3. A statute that has the effect of violating or repudiating an incompleted contract previously made with the state does not impair the obligation of a contract. The obligation remains as before and forms the measure of the contractor's right to recover from the state the damages sustained.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, 1340-1342, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — taking for public purpose — compensation — notice and hearing.

4. The property rights, if any, of one contracting with the state for the construction of a waterway, cannot be said to have been taken without due process of law by state legislation vacating a portion of such waterway and vesting title thereto in a municipal corporation, where there was adequate provision in the state law for assured payment without unreasonable delay of any compensation due such contractor on account of such taking.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, 616-673; Eminent Domain, VI. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Pleading — what must be pleaded — laches.

5. Laches is a defense that, in the equity practice of the Federal courts, need not be set up by plea or answer. It is for the complainant in his bill to excuse the delay in seeking equitable relief, where there has been such, and if it be not excused, his laches may be taken advantage of either by demurrer or upon final hearing.

[For other cases, see Pleading, III. g, 1, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Washington to review a decree which dismissed a bill to enjoin the enforcement of a state statute vacating a portion of a waterway and vesting title thereto in a municipality. Affirmed.

See same case below, 226 Fed. 287.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William F. Hays, in propria persona, argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant:

The state of Washington had power to enter into the contract involved in this suit, and it is valid.

Hays v. Hill, 23 Wash. 730, 63 Pac. 576; Hays v. Callvert, 36 Wash. 138, 78 Pac. 793; Allen v. Forrest, 8 Wash. 700, 24 L.R.A. 606, 36 Pac. 971; Scholpp v. Forrest, 11 Wash. 640, 40 Pac. 133; Missouri Valley Trust Co. v. Hofius, 20 Wash. 272, 55 Pac. 54.

The contract gave to appellant a vested property right in and to the said waterway from the time the contract was entered into and the approval of the bond guaranteeing for appellant its performance, and the record shows that appellant, without any duty on his part, express or implied, in order to safeguard his rights, as also the rights of the state under the contract, prosecuted, at great personal expense, two suits to the highest court of the state of Washington.

Hays v. Hill, and Hays v. Callvert, supra.

The right of appellant in and to the contract giving him the exclusive title to the earth contained in the waterway, for filling adjacent tidelands, has not been and cannot be successfully questioned. The statute enacted to vacate the waterway, and vest title thereto in the port of Seattle, is the taking of appellant's property without due process of law, and is void.

Taylor, Due Process of Law, chap. 11, §§ 216, 218–220.

The relation of the state to appellant under the contract is a continuing trust and the doctrine of laches is inapplicable.

7 Enc. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 813, note 56.

Mr. L. T. Turner argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Harold Preston and O. B. Thorgrimson, filed a brief for appellees:

The question raised by appellant is now a moot one, and will not be considered by this court.

Little v. Bowers, 134 U. S. 547, 33 L. ed. 1016, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620; Kimball v. Kimball, 174 U. S. 158, 43 L. ed. 932, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 639; Washington Market Co. v. District of Columbia, 137 U. The vacating of the waterway by the state merely constituted a breach of contract, and did not impair its obligation.

Appellant has lost his rights under the contract through laches.

[234] Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant filed his bill in equity for an injunction to restrain the enforcement of an act of the legislature of the state of Washington, approved March 11, 1913 (Sess. Laws, p. 195), entitled, "An Act Vacating a Portion of Smith's Cove Waterway, in the City of Seattle, and Vesting the Title of the Vacated Portion in the Port of Seattle," upon the ground (a) that it impaired the obligation of an existing contract between him and the state, in violation of § 10 of art. 1 of the Constitution of the United States; and (b) that it deprived him of property without due process of law, contrary to § 1 of the 14th Amendment. The district court, on final hearing, dismissed the bill (226 Fed. 287), and the case is brought here by direct appeal under § 238, Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1157, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1215, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 794], because of the constitutional questions.

The facts, shortly stated, are as follows: Under an act of the legislature approved March 9, 1893 (Sess. Laws, p. 241), which made provision for the excavation by private contract of waterways for the uses of navigation, complainant and another party to whose rights he has succeeded obtained a contract with the state, acting by the commissioner of public lands, which was approved by the governor on March 7, 1896. It provided for the excavation by complainant of Smith's cove waterway, in Seattle harbor, extending from the outer harbor line through the intervening tidelands to the head of Smith's cove, the excavated material to be used for filling in and raising above high tide the adjacent tide and shore lands belonging to the state of Washington. For doing this he was to be entitled to compensation equivalent to the cost of the work, plus 15 per centum and interest, for which he was to have a lien upon the tide and shore lands so filled in. The state agreed to hold these lands subject to the operation of the contract pending its execution, and [235] subject to the ultimate lien of the contractor thereon, and that it would perform by its authorized agents all things required by the Act of 1893 to be performed by the state. The contract provided for and specified the character of the bulkheads and retaining walls to be used, reserving, however, to the commissioner of public lands, the right to modify these plans and specifications as to "shape, form, and character of material," as might appear necessary. The contract required complainant at his own cost to excavate also a waterway to extend from the north end of the Smith's cove waterway across the peninsula separating the cove from Salmon bay, such excavation to be made under the direction and in accordance with the plans of an engineer to be designated by the governor of the state or the Secretary of War of the United States, and when excavated to be owned, possessed, and controlled by the United States or by the state, free of cost to them, if the right of way and the privilege of excavating across the peninsula should be accorded to the contractor free of cost, or if fair compensation should be made to him therefor. Work was to be commenced within sixty days and completed within two years from the date of approval.

On May 4, 1896, complainant entered upon performance of the contract and commenced driving piles for the construction of a bulkhead. Almost immediately he was notified by the commissioner of public lands that the latter elected to exercise the right, as provided by the contract, to change the form of bulkhead. This had the effect of requiring a suspension of work until modified plans and specifications for the bulkheads should be prepared. Complainant did suspend the work, and it never was resumed thereafter. There were negotiations and correspondence between him and the commissioner of public lands looking to the preparation of the modified plans and specifications, but they resulted in nothing. [236] Each party seems to have insisted that it was the duty of the other to furnish them.

Complainant contends that he was at all times ready and prepared to carry out the contract on his part, but was prevented from doing so by acts and omissions of the state and its representatives, including the failure to furnish plans for the modified form of bulkhead and a failure to furnish complainant with a right of way across the peninsula between the head of Smith's cove and Salmon bay. Defendants contend that repeatedly, and in particular in the month of November, 1898, complainant was notified that his plans were wholly inadequate and would be insufficient for the purpose for which the retaining wall was designed; and that on the latter occasion he was notified to submit proper plans and specifications and to commence operations within ten days after their approval.

While the excavation project thus remained in suspense, and pursuant to an act authorizing establishment of port districts, approved March 14, 1911 (Sess. Laws, p. 412), the port of Seattle was established as a municipal corporation with territorial limits including Smith's cove waterway, Salmon bay, and the intervening peninsula. This act conferred extensive powers for the regulation, control, and improvement of the harbor and navigable and non-navigable waters within such district, in the interest of the public.

Thereafter, by the statute that is now under attack (Sess. Laws 1913, p. 195), it was enacted that the northerly part of the Smith's cove waterway should be vacated and the title thereto vested in the port of Seattle. Complainant was fully advised of this legislative measure, even prior to its enactment.

After it took effect, which was in June, 1913, the port commission took possession of the waterway, exercised control over it, and did a considerable amount of excavation, [237] filling, and bulkhead construction, having spent large sums of money therein between the taking effect of the act and November 14, 1914, when the bill of complaint was filed.

Coming to the questions raised upon the present appeal: The averments of the bill setting up the alleged obligations of complainant's contract with the state, and the contention that they were impaired by the Act of 1913, presented a controversy under the Constitution of the United States, and (a sufficient amount being involved) conferred jurisdiction upon the Federal court irrespective of the citizenship of the parties, and at the same time warranted a direct appeal to this court under § 238, Judicial Code. Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. 244 U. S. 499, 508, 61 L. ed. 1280, 1285, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88.

The merits remain for determination.

Upon the first constitutional point, it is important to note the distinction between a statute that has the effect of violating or repudiating a contract previously made by the state and one that impairs its obligation. Had the legislature of Washington, pending performance or after complete performance by complainant, passed an act to alter materially the scope of his contract, to diminish his compensation, or to defeat his lien upon the filled lands, there would no doubt have been an attempted impairment of the obligation. The legislation in question had no such purpose or effect. It simply, after seventeen years of delay without substantial performance of the contract, provided that the project should be abandoned and title to the public lands turned over to the municipality. Supposing the contract had not been abandoned by complainant himself or terminated by his long delay, its obligation remained as before, and formed the measure of his right to recover from the state for the damages sustained. Brown v. Colorado, 106 U. S. 95, 98, 27 L. ed. 132, 133, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 175; St. Paul Gaslight Co. v. St. Paul, 181 U. S. 142, 148–150, 45 L. ed. 788, 791–793, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 575; Dawson v. [238] Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, S. D. Title & T. Co. 197 U. S. 178, 181, 49 L. ed. 713, 716, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420; Lord v. Thomas, 64 N. Y. 107; Caldwell v. Donaghey, 108 Ark. 60, 64, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 721, 156 S. W. 839, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 133.

We deem it clear also that the Act of 1913 had not the effect of depriving complainant of property without due process of law, in contravention of the 14th Amendment. Assuming he had property rights and that they were taken, it clearly was done for a public purpose, and there was adequate provision for compensation in §§ 886–890, Rem. & Bal. Code of Washington, which entitle any person having a claim against the state to begin an action thereon in a designated court upon the mere giving of security for costs, whereupon service of the complaint is to be made upon the attorney general and secretary of state, the action is to proceed in all respects as other actions, with a right of appeal to the supreme court, and, in case of a final judgment against the state, a transcript of it is to be furnished to the auditor of state, who is required thereupon to "audit the amount of damages and costs therein awarded, and the same shall be paid out of the state treasury." If his claim has not been barred by limitation of time, this statute constitutes an adequate provision for assured payment of any compensation due to complainant without unreasonable delay; and hence satisfies the requirement of due process of law as clearly as if the ascertainment of compensation had preceded the taking. Bragg v. Weaver, decided December 8, 1919 [251 U. S. 57, ante, 135, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62].

The district court, besides finding complainant's case to be otherwise without merits, held in effect that he was barred from relief in equity by laches, because after the taking effect of the Act of 1913 he stood by for more than a year and permitted the port commission to enter upon extensive improvements and expend large moneys on the waterway and adjoining lands, before he began his suit. The only answer made to this is that the defense of laches was not pleaded. But in the equity practice of the courts [239] of the United States (excepted from the Conformity Act, see Rev. Stat. §§ 913, 914, Comp. Stat. §§ 1536, 1537, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 18, 21) laches is a defense that need not be set up by plea or answer. It rests upon the long-established doctrine of courts of equity that their extraordinary relief will not be accorded to one who delays the assertion of his claim for an unreasonable length of time, especially where the delay has led to a change of conditions that would render it unjust to disturb them at his instance. It is for the complainant in his bill to excuse the delay in seeking equitable relief, where there has been such; and if it be not excused, his laches may be taken advantage of either by demurrer or upon final hearing. WILLIAM SCHALL, Jr., Carl Muller, Edmund Pavenstedt, and Frederick Muller-Schall, Petitioners,

FREDERIC CAMORS et al., Trustees of the Bankrupt Estates of Albert Le More, Bankrupt, and of Edward E. Carriere, Bankrupt.

Bankruptcy — provable debts — tort claims.

1. A claim for unliquidated damages arising out of a pure tort which neither constitutes a breach of an express contract nor results in any unjust enrichment of the tort-feasor that may form the basis of an implied contract is not made provable in bankruptcy by the provision of the Bankrupt Act of July 1, 1898, § 63*b*, that unliquidated claims against the bankrupt may, pursuant to application to the court, be liquidated in such manner as it shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against his estate, since this provision does not add claims of purely tortious origin to the provable debts enumerated in paragraph a of such section, but provides a procedure for liquidating claims provable under that paragraph if not already liquidated.

Note.—On right to prove unliquidated claim for tort in bankruptcy—see note to Brown v. United Button Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 961.

On double proof of claim against estate of firm and individual partner—see note to Reynolds v. New York Trust Co. 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391.

Bankruptcy — provable debts — tort claims.

2. The class of provable claims in bankruptcy, as set forth in the provisions of the Bankrupt Act of July 1, 1898, § 63, was not enlarged so as to include mere tort claims by anything in the amendment to § 17 made by the Act of February 5, 1903, confessedly designed to restrict the scope of a discharge in bankruptcy.

[For other cases, see Bankruptcy, X. a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Bankruptcy — individual and partnership creditors.

3. No legal or equitable claim as against individual partners that might, by waiver of the tort or otherwise, be deemed to arise out of a tort done in the course of the partnership business for the benefit of the firm, and without benefit to the partners as individuals, can displace the equity of other creditors recognized in the Bankrupt Act of July 1, 1898, § 5, and put the claimants in a position of equality with others who were actual creditors of the individual partners, and of preference over other firm creditors.

[For other cases, see Bankruptcy, X. c, 1, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, disallowing certain claims against the individual bankrupt members of a bankrupt partnership. Affirmed.

See same case below, — A.L.R. —, 162 C. C. A. 178, 250 Fed. 6.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ralph S. Rounds argued the cause, and, with Mr. Eugene Congleton, filed a brief for petitioners:

The petitioners' claim is provable against the individual partners on the ground that the fraud of the individual members of the firm made them liable in quasi contract or equitable debt; and against the firm in express contract or in quasi contract or equitable debt, because it received the proceeds of the frauds.

A statute is capable of legislative as well as judicial construction, and legislative construction by amendment of a statute is persuasive upon the courts.

Marchie Tiger v. Western Invest. Co. 221 U. S. 286, 308, 55 L. ed. 738, 746, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578; Baker v. Swigart, 118 C. C. A. 313, 199 Fed. 867.

The cardinal rule of statutory construction is that all the words of a statute should be read together to determine its meaning. If the several sections of the statute relating to a particular subject, when read together, are harmonious, there is no room for construction by the courts, and, irrespective of what they may consider the best policy to be, they should give effect to the statute.

It is also a settled rule of statutory construction that prior acts may be resorted to, to solve, but not to create, an ambiguity.

A construction which denies tort creditors the right to prove in bankruptcy, and denies the bankrupt a discharge from tort claims, is inequitable and unjust, and if the statute is ambiguous, should be avoided by the court.

Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 65, 44 L. ed. 969, 978, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747.

Claims for negligence and other tort claims against corporations which cannot avail themselves of the bankruptcy statutes, as railroads, etc., whose insolvent estates are administered in courts of equity, may be reduced to judgment after the filing of the bill and the appointment of a receiver, or liquidated in the insolvency proceedings, and may afterwards participate in the distribution of the insolvent estate with contract creditors.

If tort claims in general are not provable, and therefore not dischargeable under the provisions of the statute, further instances of the imperfect working of the statute, and, in fact, of the failure of its purpose, are presented.

The liability of Albert Le More and Edward E. Carriere being predicated upon their conscious, criminal participation in the frauds, it is immaterial whether the claims are presented as claims in tort for fraud, or as claims upon an implied or quasi contract or equitable debt. In any event, the petitioners are entitled to prove their claims both against the firm estate and against the individual estates of the partners.

There is an unbroken current of authority under the earlier Bankruptcy Acts, establishing that the substantive rights of creditors to make proof where a firm and its individual members are jointly and severally liable upon an express contract or in quasi contract is not affected or impaired by the provisions in the earlier acts corresponding to § 5f of the present Bankruptcy Act.

It follows that the enactment of the same general rule in the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 justifies the conclusion that it was the legislative intent that the statute of 1898 should bear the same construction as the corresponding provisions of the earlier Bankruptcy Acts.

It was the special object of the Bankruptcy Act to remove all purely technical circumstances in the administration of partnership and individual estates, and to permit claims to be handled as justice and equity required.

2 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. 590.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

The transactions out of which this controversy arose took place in the years 1913 and 1914. At that time Le More and Carriere carried on business as partners in the cities of New Orleans, Louisiana, and Mobile, Alabama. Afterwards, and in the month of May, 1914, upon an involuntary petition in bankruptcy, the firm and the individual members thereof were adjudged bankrupts in the United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, New Orleans division, and the present respondents were elected and qualified as trustees of both the partnership and the individual estates. The present [247] petitioners, constituting the firm of Muller, Schall, & Company, filed three proofs of claim, one against the partnership and one against each of the individual partners, all based upon the same transactions, which consisted of the purchase by claimants in the city of New York, through an agent of the bankrupt firm named Trippe, of certain bills of exchange and checks drawn by the firm upon London, Paris, and Antwerp, aggregating about $70,000, all of which were sold to petitioners for full value on the faith of certain fraudulent representations not necessary to be specified, and, at maturity, were presented for payment, dishonored, and protested, and notice thereof given to the firm. At the time of these transactions Le More was in Europe and Carriere in New Orleans, and neither of them participated in the particular transactions, although both were cognizant of them and responsible for the false representations. The particular drafts and checks were not signed or indorsed by either partner, and neither profited from their sale except through his interest in the firm. The transactions occurred in the ordinary course of the firm's business, except that they were fraudulent and the proceeds of the drafts and checks went to the credit of the firm and were used in the conduct of its business. Petitioners' claim against the partnership is based upon the drafts and checks as partnership obligations in contract, and also upon the damages sustained by reason of the fraudulent representations. The claims against the individual estates of the partners in terms demand only damages for the false representations, but are relied upon as showing also, by inference, an individual liability in quasi contract or equitable debt.

The trustees petitioned the district court that the latter claims should be expunged. After a hearing the referee in bankruptcy, for reasons expressed in an elaborate opinion, ordered that the claims against the individual [248] estates should be "expugned and disallowed," and the rights of claimants to participate in dividends in such estates denied. Upon review, the district court affirmed this order, and, upon appeal, its decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, — A.L.R. —, 162 C. C. A. 178, 250 Fed. 6. A writ of certiorari brings the case here.

No question is made as to whether the referee's order, in wholly expunging the claims against the individual estates and denying to petitioners all participation therein, went too far, in view of the provision of § 5f of the Bankruptcy Act (July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, 548, Comp. Stat. § 9589, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 578), that "should any surplus remain of the property of any partner after paying his individual debts, such surplus shall be added to the partnership assets and be applied to the payment of the partnership debts." If the decision be sustained, petitioners nevertheless will be entitled, upon establishing their claim against the partnership, to participate as partnership creditors in any surplus that may remain of individual assets after payment of individual debts. What was asserted and overruled was a right to double proof, establishing a separate and independent liability on the part of the individual partners that would give to the claimants, in addition to their participation in the partnership assets, a participation in the individual assets on equal terms with other individual creditors, and in preference to other partnership creditors.

The first and fundamental question is whether a claim for unliquidated damages, arising out of a pure tort which neither constitutes a breach of an express contract nor results in any unjust enrichment of the tort-feasor that may form the basis of an implied contract, is provable in bankruptcy. This question was passed upon by the referee and by the district court; it has been most elaborately argued pro and con in this court; its general importance in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act warranted a review of the case by certiorari; and hence it is [249] proper that we dispose of it, without regard to whether a like result might follow, upon the particular facts of the case, from a decision of any subordinate question.

Considering, therefore, the question stated: Among other definitions included in § 1 of the Bankruptcy Act is this: "(11) 'debt' shall include any debt, demand, or claim provable in bankruptcy." Section 63 runs as follows: "Debts which may be proved.—(a) Debts of the bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate which are (1) a fixed liability, as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which would have been recoverable at that date or with a rebate of interest upon such as were not then payable and did not bear interest; . . . (4) founded upon an open account, or upon a contract express or implied; . . .

"(b) Unliquidated claims against the bankrupt may, pursuant to application to the court, be liquidated in such manner as it shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against his estate."

In Dunbar v. Dunbar, 190 U. S. 340, 350, 47 L. ed. 1084, 1092, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757, it was said: "This ¶ b, however, adds nothing to the class of debts which might be proved under ¶ a of the same section. Its purpose is to permit an unliquidated claim, coming within the provisions of § 63a, to be liquidated as the court should direct." But in Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 187, 49 L. ed. 147, 151, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9, the question whether the effect of ¶ b was to cause an unliquidated claim, susceptible of liquidation, but not literally embraced by ¶ a, to be provable in bankruptcy, was regarded as still open.

That clause b provides the procedure for liquidating claims provable under clause a if not already liquidated, especially those founded upon an open account or a contract express or implied, is entirely clear, and has been [250] recognized repeatedly in our decisions. Frederic L. Grant Shoe Co. v. W. M. Laird Co. 212 U. S. 445, 447, 448, 53 L. ed. 591, 593, 594, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332; Central Trust Co. v. Chicago Auditorium Asso. 240 U. S. 581, 592, 60 L. ed. 811, 816, L.R.A.1917B, 580, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412. Has it the further effect of admitting all unliquidated claims, including those of tortious origin?

Historically, bankruptcy laws, both in England and in this country, have dealt primarily and particularly with the concerns of traders. Our earlier bankruptcy acts invariably have been regarded as excluding from consideration unliquidated claims arising purely ex delicto. Act of April 4, 1800, chap. 19, 2 Stat. at L. 19; Dusar v. Murgatroyd, 1 Wash. C. C. 13, Fed. Cas. No. 4,199; Act of August 19, 1841, chap. 9, 5 Stat. at L 440; Doggett v. Emerson, 1 Woodb. & M. 195, Fed. Cas. No. 3,962; Act of March 2, 1867, chap. 176, §§ 11 and 19, 14 Stat. at L. 517, 521, 525, U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5014, 5067; Black v. McClelland, Fed. Cas. No. 1,462; Re Schuchardt, 8 Ben. 585, Fed. Cas. No. 12,483; Re Boston & F. Iron Works, 23 Fed. 880.

Can it be supposed that the present act was intended to depart so widely from the precedents as to include mere tort claims among the provable debts? Its 63d section does not so declare in terms, and there is nothing in the history of the act to give ground for such an inference. It was the result of a long period of agitation, participated in by commercial conventions, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other commercial bodies. To say nothing of measures proposed in previous Congresses, a bill in substantially the present form was favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives in the first session of the 54th Congress. Having then failed of passage, it was submitted again in the second session of the 55th Congress as a substitute for a Senate bill; after disagreeing votes of the two Houses, it went to conference, and as the result of a conference [251] report became law. It is significant that § 63, defining "debts which may be proved," remained unchanged from first to last, except for a slight and insignificant variance in clause (5) in the final print, the word "interests" having been substituted for "interest." House Rept. No. 1228, 54th Cong. 1st Sess. p. 39; House Rept. No. 65, 55th Cong. 2d Sess. p. 21; Senate Doc. No. 294, 55th Cong. 2d Sess. p. 22. Evidently the words of the section were carefully chosen; and the express mention of contractual obligations naturally excludes those arising from a mere tort. Since claims founded upon an open account or upon a contract express or implied often require to be liquidated, some provision for procedure evidently was called for; clause b fulfils this function, and would have to receive a strained interpretation in order that it should include claims arising purely ex delicto. Such claims might easily have been mentioned if intended to be included. Upon every consideration, we are clear that claims based upon a mere tort are not provable. Where the tortious act constitutes at the same time a breach of contract, a different question may be raised, with which we have no present concern; and where, by means of the tort, the tort-feasor obtains something of value for which an equivalent price ought to be paid, even if the tort as such be forgiven, there may be a provable claim quasi ex contractu. Crawford v. Burke, supra; Tindle v. Birkett, 205 U. S. 183, 186, 51 L. ed. 762, 764, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Clarke v. Rogers, 106 C. C. A. 64, 183 Fed. 518, 521, 522, affirmed in 228 U. S. 534, 543, 57 L. ed. 953, 957, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 587.

Of course, §§ 63 and 17 are to be read together. The reference in the latter section to "provable debts," defined in the former, would be sufficient to show this. See Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 193, 49 L. ed. 147, 153, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9; Tindle v. Birkett, 205 U. S. 183, 186, 51 L. ed. 762, 764, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Friend v. Talcott, 228 U. S. 27, 39, 57 L. ed. 718, 723, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 505; Clarke v. Rogers, 228 U. S. 534, 548, 57 L. ed. 953, 959, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 587. It is petitioners' contention that § 17, as amended in 1903 (Act of February 5, 1903, chap. 487, § 5, 32 Stat. at L. 797, 798, Comp. Stat. § 9601), amounts to a legislative [252] construction admitting tort claims to proof. The section as it stood before, and the nature of the amendment, are set forth in the margin.[1] We are referred to the Committee's report (House Rept. No. 1698, 57th Cong. 1st Sess. pp. 3, 6) as indicating that, by the law as it stood, in the opinion of the Committee, claims created by fraud, but not reduced to judgment, were discharged; reference having been made to Re Rhutassel, 96 Fed. 597, and Re Lewensohn, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 381, 99 Fed. 73, affirmed in 44 C. C. A. 309, 104 Fed. 1006, as contradictory decisions upon the point. But neither the report of the Committee nor the language of the amendment gives the least suggestion of an intent to enlarge the description of provable claims as set forth in § 63. On the contrary, the purpose was to limit more [253] narrowly the effect of a discharge by enlarging the class of provable debts that were to be excepted from it. By the terms of the section, both before and after amendment, the scope of the exception was qualified by the fact that the discharge released the bankrupt only from "provable debts."

[1] Section as originally enacted (30 Stat. at L. 550, chap. 541, Comp. Stat. § 9601, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. 708).

"Sec. 17. Debts not affected by a discharge.—(a) A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the state, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are judgments in actions for frauds, or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for wilful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity."

Amendment of 1903 (32 Stat. at L. 798, chap. 487, Comp. Stat. § 9601) inserted in the place of clause 2 the following:

"(2) are liabilities for obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for wilful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another, or for alimony due or to become due, or for maintenance or support of wife or child, or for seduction of an unmarried female, or for criminal conversation."

NOTE: By a further amendment (Act of March 2, 1917, chap. 153, 39 Stat. at L. 999, Comp. Stat. § 9601) there was inserted after the word "female," instead of "or for criminal conversation," the following: "or for breach of promise of marriage accompanied by seduction, or for criminal conversation."

And if the excepting clause as amended might seem to extend to some claims not otherwise provable, its own force must be deemed to be limited by referring to § 63 for the definition of provability. It is not admissible to give to this amendment, confessedly designed to restrict the scope of a discharge in bankruptcy, the effect of enlarging the class of provable claims.

Aside from § 17 or the amendment thereof, it has been held by the Federal courts generally that § 63 does not authorize the liquidation and proof of claims arising ex delicto and unaffected by contract, express or implied. Re Hirschman, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 1123, 104 Fed. 69–71; Re Yates, 114 Fed. 365, 367; Re Crescent Lumber Co. 154 Fed. 724, 727; Re Southern Steel Co. 183 Fed. 498.

And that the amendment of § 17 does not enlarge the class of provable claims enumerated in § 63 has been recognized in several well-considered decisions of the Federal courts, which have held, upon satisfactory grounds, that pure tort claims are not provable. Re United Button Co. 140 Fed. 495, 499, et seq.; s. c. on appeal, Brown v. United Button Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 961, 79 C. C. A. 70, 149 Fed. 48, 52, 53, 9 Ann. Cas. 445; Re New York Tunnel Co. 86 C. C. A. 556, 159 Fed. 688, 690. In Jackson v. Wauchula Mfg. & Timber Co. 144 C. C. A. 551, 230 Fed. 409, 411, and again in the present case (— A.L.R. —, 162 C. C. A. 178, 250 Fed. 7), the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit passed the question as unnecessary for the decision.

There is an argument ab inconvenienti, based upon the supposed danger that if tort claims be held not provable they may be preferred by failing debtors without redress [254] under § 60, a and b (30 Stat. at L. 562, chap. 541, amended February 5, 1903, chap. 487, § 13, 32 Stat. at L. 797, 799, amended June 25, 1910, chap. 412, § 11, 36 Stat. at L. 838, 842, Comp. Stat. § 9644, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1026), held to apply only to provable claims (Richardson v. Shaw, 209 U. S. 365, 381, 52 L. ed. 835, 843, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 512, 14 Ann. Cas. 981; see also Clarke v. Rogers, 228 U. S. 534, 542, 57 L. ed. 953, 957, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 587). We are not much impressed. If there be danger of mischief here, other than such as may be reached under the provisions of § 67e or § 70e, respecting fraudulent conveyances and transfers (see Dean v. Davis, 242 U. S. 438, 444, 61 L. ed. 419, 421, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 130), the Congress may be trusted to supply the remedy by an appropriate amendment.

It is insisted by petitioners, further, that because the proofs of the individual claims establish the responsibility of each partner for the frauds, they are liable in solido not only as partners, but individually; and that, irrespective of whether the claims are provable in tort for the fraud, they are provable and were properly proved both against the individual partners and against the firm as claims in quasi contract or equitable debt. But as the basis of a liability of this character is the unjust enrichment of the debtor, and as the facts show that no benefit accrued to the individuals as a result of the frauds beyond that which accrued to the firm, the logical result of the argument is that out of one enrichment there may arise three separate and independent indebtednesses. Doubtless it would be conceded that a single satisfaction would discharge all of the claims; but we are dealing with a situation where, by reason of insolvency, it is not to be presumed that claims will be satisfied in full; and, as already pointed out, the effect of sustaining the right to double proof would be to give petitioners not only a right to share in the partnership assets on equal terms with other partnership creditors, but a participation in the individual assets on equal terms with other individual creditors and in preference to other partnership creditors. Section 5 of the Bankruptcy Act (30 Stat. at L. 547, 548, chap. 541, Comp. Stat. § 9589, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 578) establishes on a firm basis the respective [255] equities of the individual and firm creditors.[2]

[2] "Sec. 5. Partners.— . . .

"(d) The trustee shall keep separate accounts of the partnership property and of the property belonging to the individual partners.

"(f) The net proceeds of the partnership property shall be appropriated to the payment of the partnership debts, and the net proceeds of the individual estate of each partner to the payment of his individual debts. Should any surplus remain of the property of any partner after paying his individual debts, such surplus shall be added to the partnership assets and be applied to the payment of the partnership debts. . . .

"(g) The court may permit the proof of the claim of the partnership estate against the individual estates, and vice versa, and may marshal the assets of the partnership estate and individual estates so as to prevent preferences and secure the equitable distribution of the property of the several estates.

Hence the distinction between individual and firm debts is a matter of substance, and must depend upon the essential character of the transactions out of which they arise. And since, in this case, the tort was done in the course of the partnership business, for the benefit of the firm and without benefit to the partners as individuals, no legal or equitable claim as against the individuals that might be deemed to arise out of it, by waiver of the tort or otherwise, can displace the equities of other creditors, recognized in the Bankruptcy Act, and put petitioners in a position of equality with others who actually were creditors of the individual partners, and of preference over other firm creditors. Reynolds v. New York Trust Co. 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391, 110 C. C. A. 409, 188 Fed. 611, 619, 620.

Decree affirmed.

[256] MERGENTHALER LINOTYPE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
SAMUEL W. DAVIS and W. B. Hayes.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 256–259.)

Error to state court — when judgment is that of highest state court.

1. A judgment of a Missouri court of appeals which reversed the judgment below after the state supreme court had, on certiorari, quashed a prior judgment of affirmance in the court of appeals, and had remanded the cause to that court for decision, is a judgment of the highest state court for purposes of a writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court.

Error to state court — Federal question — when raised too late.

2. A Federal question first raised on motion for rehearing in a state appellate court comes too late to serve as the basis of a writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, 1292–1310, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Error to state court — Federal question — error or certiorari.

3. The assertion of a title, right, privilege, or immunity under the Federal Constitution may afford the basis for a writ of certiorari from the Federal Supreme Court to a state court, but it constitutes no ground for a writ of error.

Submitted on motion to dismiss December 8, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Springfield Court of Appeals of the State of Missouri to review a judgment which, conformably to the mandate of the Supreme Court of the state, reversed a judgment of the Circuit Court of Buckner County in favor of plaintiff, a foreign corporation, in a suit for rentals under a lease of a machine. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

See same case below, in Supreme Court, 271 Mo. 475, 196 S. W. 1132; in Court of Appeals, — Mo. App. —, 202 S. W. 300.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

On certiorari to state courts—see notes to Andrews v. Virginian R. Co. 63 L. ed. U. S. 236; and Bruce v. Tobin, 62 L. ed. U. S. 123.

Mr. Bradford Butler submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

Where the record shows that the constitutional question was treated by the state court as being involved in the case, and is distinctly passed upon by it, it will be held to be open to examination by the United States Supreme Court on writ of error.

The writ of error in this case was properly directed to the judgment of the Springfield court of appeals, as that was the only final judgment in the action, and under the Missouri Constitution, as construed by the Missouri supreme court, this was the judgment of the highest court of the state in which a determination in the matter could be had.

Messrs. Ernest A. Green and J. C. Sheppard submitted the cause for defendants in error. Mr. A. L. Sheppard was on the brief:

This court is without jurisdiction to review the decision of the Springfield court of appeals of the state of Missouri upon a writ of error.

Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. v. Gilbert, 245 U. S. 162, 62 L. ed. 221, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58.

This court is without jurisdiction of this writ of error because certiorari would be the only proper method of reviewing this judgment, since there is no question involved in this case as to the constitutionality of a state statute.

Rep. 21.

[257] Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

Dismissal of this writ is asked—first, because it does not run to a final judgment "in the highest court of the state in which a decision in the suit could be had," second, because there was not properly drawn in question below "the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States," or "the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States." Judicial Code, § 237, Act September 6, 1916, chap. 448, 39 Stat. at L. 726, Comp. Stat. § 1214, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 411; Coon v. Kennedy, 248 U. S. 457, 63 L. ed. 358, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 146; Godchaux Co. v. Estopinal, decided December 22, 1919 [251 U. S. 179, ante, 213, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 116].

The trial court, proceeding without jury, gave judgment for rentals due the Linotype Company under written lease of a machine, etc. The Springfield court of appeals affirmed that action. Thereupon the supreme court took jurisdiction by writ of certiorari, rendered an opinion, quashed the judgment of affirmance, and remanded the cause to the court of appeals for decision. 271 Mo. 475, 196 S. W. 1132.

Following the supreme court's opinion, the court of appeals ordered the judgment of the trial court "reversed, annulled, and for naught held and esteemed; that the said appellants be restored to all they have lost by reason of the said judgment; that the said appellants recover of the said respondent costs and charges herein expended, and have execution therefor." A motion there for rehearing having been overruled, without more, this writ of error was sued out.

The assignments of error here challenge the validity of §§ 3037–3040 and § 3342, Revised Statutes of Missouri 1909, because in conflict with the Federal Constitution. This claim was first set up in the court of appeals upon the motion for rehearing.

[258] The Missouri Constitution gives the supreme court "superintending control over the courts of appeals by mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari," and provides that "the last previous rulings of the supreme court on any question of law or equity shall, in all cases, be controlling authority in said courts of appeals." In State ex rel. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellison, 268 Mo. 225, 238, 186 S. W. 1075, a proceeding upon a certiorari, the court declared: "We can undo what the court of appeals has done; . . . and we can send the record back to them to be heard anew by them, . . . but in the Kansas City court of appeals alone lies the jurisdiction to hear and to correctly and finally determine the case to which the instant proceeding is ancillary." See also State ex rel. Miles v. Ellison, 269 Mo. 151, 190 S. W. 274; Schmohl v. Travelers' Ins. Co. — Mo. —, 197 S. W. 60.

In the present cause, the supreme court said: "This is an original proceeding by certiorari. . . . It is urged by relator as his ground for quashal, that the opinion of the court of appeals is in conflict with the case of United Shoe Machinery Co. v. Ramlose, 210 Mo. 631, 109 S. W. 567. . . . If this decision be opposed to what we said, or the conclusion which we reached upon similar facts (if the facts are similar) in the Ramlose Case, we ought to quash the judgment of the court of appeals. This is the sole question to be determined."

Under the Missouri practice and circumstances here disclosed, we think the judgment of the Springfield court of appeals was final within the meaning of § 237, Judicial Code. No suggestion is made that further review by the supreme court could be had, as matter of discretion or otherwise.

The only ground mentioned in the assignments of error upon which this writ could be sustained is conflict between specified sections of the Missouri statutes relating to transactions by foreign corporations and the Federal Constitution. But this point came too late, being first [259] advanced below on the motion for rehearing. Godchaux Co. v. Estopinal, supra.

The claim that the lease contract was made in course of interstate commerce, and therefore not subject to state statutes, was insufficient to challenge the validity of the latter; at most it but asserted a "title, right, privilege, or immunity" under the Federal Constitution which might afford basis for certiorari, but constitutes no ground for writ of error from this court.

Dismissed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY, Petitioner,

v.

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION of the State of California and Mary E. Butler and Albert Nelson Butler, a Minor, by Mary E. Butler, His Guardian ad Litem.

Master and servant — employers' liability — when servant is engaged in interstate commerce.

1. Generally, when the applicability of the Federal Employers' Liability Act is uncertain, the character of the employment in relation to commerce may be adequately tested by inquiring whether, at the time of the injury, the employee was engaged in work so closely connected with interstate transportation as practically to be a part of it.

[For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. a, 2, b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Master and servant — employers' liability — when servant is engaged in interstate commerce — electric lineman.

2. The work of an electric lineman in wiping insulators on one of the main electric cables of an interstate railway carrier running from a power house to a reduction and transforming station, whence the current ran to the trolley wires and thence to the motors of the carrier's cars engaged in both intrastate and interstate commerce, is so directly and intimately connected with interstate transportation as to render a state workmen's compensation law inapplicable, where the lineman was killed as the result of an electric shock received while so engaged.

[For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. a, 2, b; Commerce, I. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Submitted December 18, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of California to review a judgment which affirmed an award of the state Industrial Accident Commission. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 178 Cal. 20, 171 Pac. 1071.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.—On the constitutionality, application, and effect of the Federal Employers' Liability Act—see notes to Lamphere v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 38; and Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Horton, L.R.A.1915C, 47.

Messrs. Henley C. Booth and William F. Herrin submitted the cause for petitioner:

The writ of certiorari was properly granted.

The instant case falls under the Federal Employers' Liability Act because deceased was doing the act for the purpose of furthering the work of interstate commerce (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Parker, 242 U. S. 13, 14, 61 L. ed. 119, 120, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4), and was engaged in keeping in usable condition an instrument then in use in such interstate transportation (Shanks v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 239 U. S. 556-560, 60 L. ed. 436-439, L.R.A.1916C, 797, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188), and was keeping instrumentalities in a proper state of repair while used in interstate commerce, which service is so closely related to such commerce as to be in practice and legal contemplation a part of it (Pedersen v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 229 U. S. 149-151, 57 L. ed. 1127, 1128, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153, 3 N. C. C. A. 779).

All section men and track laborers, while working on or repairing any part of the track or switches used by a common carrier or railroad indiscriminately for both interstate and intrastate commerce, are employed in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

New York C. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 147, 61 L. ed. 1045, L.R.A.1918C, 439, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 546, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1139, 14 N. C. C. A. 680; St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. United States, 146 C. C. A. 379, 192 Fed. 901; Zikos v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 179 Fed. 893.

In Southern R. Co. v. McGuin, 153 C. C. A. 447, 240 Fed. 649, it is held that a section man who was working with a road engineer in setting stakes, with the view of improving a curve by a slight change in track, was employed in interstate commerce.

In St. Louis, S. F. & T. R. Co. v. Seale, 229 U. S. 156, 57 L. ed. 1129, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 651, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 156, a clerk was held to be employed in interstate commerce when he was on his way through a railroad yard to meet an inbound interstate freight train, and to mark the cars so that the switching crew would know what to do with them when breaking up the train.

Messrs. Christopher M. Bradley and Warren H. Pillsbury submitted the cause for respondents:

The deceased employee was not engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

William T. Butler, husband of respondent Mary E. Butler, was killed at Oakland, California, while employed by the Southern Pacific Company as an electric lineman. The supreme court of the state affirmed an award rendered by the California Industrial Commission against the company, and the cause is properly here by writ of certiorari.

The fatal accident, which occurred June 21, 1917, arose out of and happened in the course of deceased's employment. He "received an electric shock while wiping insulators, which caused him to fall from a steel power pole, producing injury which proximately caused his death." At that time the company, a common carrier by railroad, maintained a power house at Fruitvale, California, where it manufactured the electric current which moved its cars engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce. From the generators this current passed along main lines or cables, through a reduction and transforming station, to the trolley wires, and thence to the motors. When he received the electric shock, deceased was engaged in work on one of the main lines necessary to keep it in serviceable condition. If such work was part of interstate commerce, the Workmen's Compensation Act of the state is inapplicable and the judgment below must be reversed. Otherwise, it must be affirmed. Employers' Liability Act, [263] April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, Comp. Stat. § 8657, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1208; New York C. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 147, 61 L. ed. 1045, L.R.A.1918C, 439, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 546, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1139, 14 N. C. C. A. 680; New York C. R. Co. v. Porter, 249 U. S. 168, 63 L. ed. 536, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188.

Generally, when applicability of the Federal Employers' Liability Act is uncertain, the character of the employment, in relation to commerce, may be adequately tested by inquiring whether, at the time of the injury, the employee was engaged in work so closely connected with interstate transportation as practically to be a part of it. Pedersen v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, 151, 57 L. ed. 1125, 1127, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153, 3 N. C. C. A. 779; Shanks v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 239 U. S. 556, 558, 60 L. ed. 436, 438, L.R.A.1916C, 797, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188; New York C. R. Co. v. Porter, supra; Kinzell v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 250 U. S. 130, 133, 63 L. ed. 893, 896, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412.

Power is no less essential than tracks or bridges to the movement of cars. The accident under consideration occurred while deceased was wiping insulators actually supporting a wire which then carried electric power so intimately connected with the propulsion of cars that if it had been short-circuited through his body, they would have stopped instantly. Applying the suggested test, we think these circumstances suffice to show that his work was directly and immediately connected with interstate transportation, and an essential part of it.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Mr. Justice Clarke dissents.

[264] JACOB RUPPERT, a Corporation, Appt.,
v.
FRANCIS G. CAFFEY, United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, and Richard J. McElligott, Acting and Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue of the Third District of New York.

War — power of Congress — passing of war emergency — war-time prohibition.

1. The war emergency had not passed so as to invalidate as new legislation the provision of the Volstead Act of October 28, 1919, extending the prohibition of the Act of November 21, 1918, against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, to malt liquors, whether in fact intoxicating or not, with an alcoholic content of as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

Note.—For a discussion of police power, generally—see notes to State v Marshall, 1 L.R.A. 51; Re Gannon, 5 L.R.A. 359; State v. Schlemmer, 10 L.R.A. 135; Ulman v. Baltimore, 11 L.R.A. 224; Electric Improv. Co. v. San Francisco, 13 L.R.A. 131; and Barbier v. Connolly, 28 L. ed. U. S. 923.

As to what constitutes due process of law, generally—see notes to People v. O'Brien, 2 L.R.A. 255; Kuntz v. Sump-

War — power of Congress — war-time prohibition.

2. The implied war power of Congress over intoxicating liquors extends to the enactment of laws which will not merely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, but will effectually prevent their sale.

States — relation to Federal government — police power.

3. When the United States exerts any of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, no valid objection can be based upon the fact that such exercise may be attended by the same incidents which attend an exercise by a state of its police power.

[For other cases, see States, IV. d, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

War — power of Congress — war-time prohibition — nonintoxicating malt liquors.

4. Congress, in the exercise of the war power, could, in order to make effective the existing war-time prohibition against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, enact the provisions of the Volstead Act of October 28, 1919, extending such prohibition to malt liquors, whether in fact intoxicating or not, with alcoholic content of as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume.

Constitutional law — due process of law — war-time prohibition.

5. Congress could, consistently with the due process of law clause of U. S. Const., 5th Amend., make effective forthwith the provisions of the Volstead Act of October 28, 1919, extending the existing war-time prohibition against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors to nonintoxicating malt liquors with alcoholic content of as much as ½ of 1 per cent by volume, without making any compensation to the owner of such liquors acquired before the passage of the act, and which before that time he could lawfully have sold.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 20 and 21, 1919. Decided January 5, 1920.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a decree which dismissed the bill in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of the Volstead Act against nonintoxicating malt liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Elihu Root and William D. Guthrie argued the cause, and, with Mr. William L. Marbury, filed a brief for appellant:

There can be no doubt that the war powers of the United States under the Federal Constitution are complete and sufficient for all war purposes, and comprehend the right to employ any appropriate means found necessary and proper for prosecuting a war, and plainly adapted to that end. Recent decisions of the courts have emphasized and illustrated the broad nature and scope of these powers.

Selective Draft Law Cases (Arver v. United States), 245 U. S. 366, 377, 62 L. ed. 352, 353, L.R.A.1918C, 361, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 856; Northern P. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 250 U. S. 135, 149, 63 L. ed. 897, 903, P.U.R.1919D, 705, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502; Salamandra Ins. Co. v. New York L. Ins. & T. Co. 254 Fed. 852.

The war powers of the United States, however, are clearly divided between Congress and the President. Whilst all legislative power in connection with war measures is vested exclusively in Congress, all executive power exercisable in connection with the waging or conducting of war is vested exclusively in the President by virtue, not only of his office as President, but of his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 139, 18 L. ed. 281, 301.

Any incidental war power of prohibition, which would necessarily interfere with the liberties and property rights of the people of the United States and the governmental powers reserved to the several states, can be exercised only in cases of existing war emergency or military necessity. In other words, the rights of the states cannot be even temporarily violated unless a war emergency reasonably warrants such action. This follows from the very nature of our Federal system and the duty of Congress and the President not to violate the express reservations of powers to the states, embodied in the 10th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or the constitutional rights of the individual.

As to constitutionality of statute prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquor—see note to Schmitt v. Cook Brewing Co. 3 A.L.R. 285.

As to constitutional right to prohibit sale of intoxicating liquor—see note to State v. Durein, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 908.

On the question as to whether statutes forbidding the sale of a certain class or classes of liquor include nonintoxicating liquor—see notes to State v. Hemrich, L.R.A.1917B, 974; Ex parte Lockman, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 759; Bowling Green v. McMullen, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 895; and Luther v. State, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1146.

Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251, 273, 276, 62 L. ed. 1101, 1106, 1107, 3 A.L.R. 649, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 724; Keller v. United States, 213 U. The rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States are not suspended and do not cease to be effective guaranties during a period of war, and are not subject to denial or curtailment by war measures, whether by the Congress or the President, unless an actual war emergency or military necessity so requires, and then only during the period of such war emergency or military necessity.

Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. 115, 149, 14 L. ed. 75, 90; Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 121, 18 L. ed. 281; 295; Raymond v. Thomas, 91 U. S. 712, 716, 23 L. ed. 434, 435.

It was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of the Constitution of the United States to vest in the President the broadest war powers, and to render him independent of Congress in respect of the exercise of those powers in the actual conduct of a war. They did not wish to permit a repetition of the interference by Congress which did so much to embarrass Washington as Commander in Chief during the Revolution.

The existence of a war emergency must be the basis and warrant for the exercise of an implied war power which tends to deny the rights of an individual or a state, and the courts are not concluded by the mere declaration of Congress, whether express or implied, that such an emergency actually exists, or shall be presumed to continue for some indefinite period in the future.

Congress is not the exclusive judge of the existence of a war emergency when exercising incidental war powers.

The constitutionality of any statute, whether criminal or not, must be determined as of the time and in the light of the circumstances existing when it is sought to be enforced against the individual. The time of actual incidence is always the test, since the effect upon the accused is alone the concern of the courts.

Rep. 511, decided June 2, 1919, in no way sustain the proposition that any implied declaration by Congress would be conclusive as to the existence of a present necessity justifying the prohibition in question.

The case of Commercial Cable Co. v. Burleson, 255 Fed. 99 (reversed by this court because rendered moot by the voluntary act of the defendants, 250 U. S. 360, 63 L. ed. 1030, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 512), did not involve a question analogous to that now under consideration, but arose rather under the exercise of the powers of eminent domain. The joint resolution there in question was passed on July 16, 1918, at the height of the war, and it expressly delegated to the President the power, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to determine if and when an actual war emergency or necessity arose, and he so determined. The court was in effect asked to overrule the decision of the Commander in Chief. An analogous question would be presented in the case at bar if title I. of the National Prohibition Act had vested in the President the duty of ascertaining and determining the existence of a war emergency or necessity as a question of fact at the time the act was to be enforced, as did the joint resolution involved in the Commercial Cable Co. Case. And even then, if power had been so vested, it certainly could not be exercised arbitrarily. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 227 U. S. 88, 91, 57 L. ed. 431, 433, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 185; American School v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 94, 47 L. ed. 90, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33.

In view of the war powers and responsibilities of the President, and his express duty to inform Congress as to the state of the Union, it must be clear that it is especially fit and proper that he should determine officially as to the existence or continuance of a war emergency, and that, in the absence of other proof, his declarations as to this question of fact or actual state and condition should be deemed the best evidence and the most certain criteria. It involves a matter peculiarly within his knowledge and jurisdiction, and in such a matter the decision of the President, as Executive and Commander in Chief, ought to be accepted as conclusive, in the absence of any other proof or criteria.

The Constitution merely confers upon Congress the right to exercise powers incidental to enumerated powers if necessary and proper; not the right to exercise powers incidental to implied incidental powers. Any other theory would strip the states of all their powers; for, if each implied incidental power breeds new powers by added implication, there is no point at which the process can be halted, but the result must in time be one consolidated government in place of our present Federal system.

In cases challenging the constitutionality of a statute, whether passed by Congress or by a state legislature, equity has jurisdiction to restrain defendant officers, who are charged by the law with its enforcement, where it appears that irreparable injury to business and property of a complainant is reasonably to be apprehended, even though some of the acts sought to be restrained are anticipated criminal proceedings. Jurisdiction over controversies similar to that now presented has been frequently sustained by this court.

According to a settled rule of statutory interpretation, effect must, if possible, be accorded to every word in a statute, and the word "other" cannot be treated as superfluous, void, or insignificant, but its use must be assumed to indicate a purpose on the part of Congress to qualify the words "beer" and "wine" immediately preceding, so that they should connote "intoxicating beer" and "intoxicating wine," respectively, and not "beer" and "wine" whether or not intoxicating.

Washington Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112, 115, 25 L. ed. 782, 783; United States v. Lexington Mill & Elevator Co. 232 U. S. 399, 410, 58 L. ed. 658, 662, L.R.A.1915B, 774, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337.

The mere fact that, under the appellant's interpretation, the words "beer" and "wine" would not serve any distinct and separate purpose that would not be comprehended within the phrase "intoxicating, malt, or vinous liquor," would not warrant the disregard of the word "other." The use of unnecessary words has long been quite common in statutes and even in Constitutions.

Assistant Attorney General Frierson and Solicitor General King argued the cause and filed a brief for appellees:

"Beer," without qualification, is plainly prohibited unless the word "intoxicating" is made to relate back and modify it. It will be insisted that this modifying result is accomplished under the rule ejusdem generis. But to make this application of that rule is to give it a meaning exactly the opposite of that which it has. The rule is that general words which follow an enumeration by words of a particular meaning are not to be construed in their widest extent, but are to be held as applying only to persons or things of the same general kind or class as those specifically mentioned. We have here an enumeration of beer and wine by words of a particular and specific meaning, followed by the general words "or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors."

Under the rule referred to, the meaning of these general words may take color from the words used in the enumeration which they follow. But there is no rule of construction under which words of a particular and specific meaning, used in an enumeration, are to be given a different meaning by reason of general language following them, and intended to describe other articles or persons. Thus, the words "other intoxicating" may be given a meaning reflected by the preceding words "beer" and "wine," and may be held to mean intoxicating in the general sense, or to the extent that beer and wine are intoxicating or alcoholic. But certainly the word "beer" cannot be taken in an unusual or strained sense by reason of any general language describing other liquors intended to be included. The rule in question leads to the conclusion that any malt or vinous liquor which is intoxicating in the sense that beer and wine are intoxicating is prohibited; but it cannot be so applied as to exclude any beverage which would ordinarily be included under the word "beer." Clearly, the intention was to prohibit all beverages which are commonly known as beer. The courts of the various states have almost uniformly given this construction to similar language.

By the Act of August 10, 1917, chap. 53, § 15, 40 Stat. at L. 276, 282, Comp. Stat. §§ 3115¼e, 3115¼l, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 181, 188, a war measure known as the Lever Act, Congress prohibited the use after September 9, 1917, of food materials or feeds in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes, and authorized the President to limit or prohibit their use in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, so far as he might, from time to time, deem it essential to assure an adequate supply of food, or deem it helpful in promoting the national security or defense. Under the power so conferred the President, by proclamation of December 8, 1917 [40 Stat. at L. 84], prohibited the production after January 1, 1918, of any "malt liquors except ale and porter" containing more than 2.75 per centum of alcohol by weight. By proclamation of September 16, 1918 [40 Stat. at L. 204], the prohibition was extended to "malt liquors, including near-beer, for [279] beverage purposes, whether or not such malt liquors contain alcohol;" and by proclamation of March 4, 1919 [40 Stat. at L. 293], the prohibition was limited "to intoxicating malt liquors." Under § 2 of the act the duty of enforcing the above provisions was assigned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This act contained no provision prohibiting the sale of intoxicating or other liquors.

On November 21, 1918, the so-called War-time Prohibition Act (chap. 212, 40 Stat. at L. 1045, Comp. Stat. § 3115½½ff) was approved. It provided that:

"After May first, nineteen hundred and nineteen, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruits, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and nineteen, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. . . ."

On February 6, 1919, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ruled (Treasury Decision, 2788) that a beverage containing as much as ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol by volume would be regarded as intoxicating within the intent of the Act of November 21, 1918; and that after May 1, 1919, persons would not be permitted to qualify as brewers, if the alcoholic content of their product equaled or exceeded that percentage. In so ruling the Commissioner adopted and applied to this prohibitory act the same classification of malt liquors which had been applied in administering the laws concerning the taxation of beer and other similar fermented liquors. [280] For since 1902 (Treasury Decision, 514) fermented liquor containing as much as ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol had been treated as taxable under Revised Statutes, §§ 3339 and 3242, Comp. Stat. §§ 6143, 5965, and this classification was expressly adopted in the War Revenue Act of October 3, 1917, chap. 63, § 307, 40 Stat. at L. 311, Comp. Stat. 6144b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 300. The correctness of this construction of the act was promptly and earnestly controverted by the brewers, who insisted that Congress had intended to prohibit the production only of such beer or other malt liquors as were in fact intoxicating. The attempt was then made to remove the doubt by new legislation before May 1, 1919, when the act would by its terms become operative. On February 26 the House Committee on the Judiciary reported favorably an Amendment to H. R. 13,581, providing: "The words 'beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors' in the War Prohibition Act shall be construed to mean any liquors which contain in excess of ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol." The Sixty-fifth Congress ended on March 4 without acting on this bill; and the Sixty-sixth Congress did not convene in extra session until May 19. On June 30, the House Committee on the Judiciary reported substantially the same provision as § 1 of title I. of H. R. 6810; but it was not enacted until October 28, 1919, when, as the Volstead Act, it was passed over the President's veto.[a]

[281] Immediately after the passage of the Volstead Act, this suit was brought in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York by Jacob Ruppert against Caffey, United States attorney, and McElligott, acting collector of internal revenue, to enjoin the enforcement as against the plaintiff of the penalties provided in the War-time Prohibition Act as amended by the Volstead Act. It was heard below on plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction and defendants' motion to dismiss; and having been dismissed, was brought here by direct appeal under § 238 of the Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1157, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1215, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 794]. The bill alleged that plaintiff, the owner of a brewery and appurtenances, was on October 28, 1919, engaged in the manufacture of a beer containing more than ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol by volume and less than 2.75 per centum by weight, or 3.4 per centum by volume, and had then on hand a large quantity of such beer; and that this beer was not in fact intoxicating. Plaintiff contended (1) that the Act of November 21, 1918, had become void, or had expired by its own terms before the bill was filed; (2) that its prohibition by its terms was limited to beer which was in fact intoxicating; (3) that the Act of October 28, 1919, title I., § 1, which purported to extend the prohibition to the manufacture and sale of beer not in fact intoxicating, exceeded the war power of Congress; and that thereby violation of rights guaranteed to plaintiff by the 5th Amendment was threatened.

This case was heard and decided below with Dryfoos v. Edwards [251 U. S. 146, ante, 194, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106], and it was argued here on the same day with that case and Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. decided December 15, 1919 [251 U. S. 146, ante, 194, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106]. For the reasons set forth in [282] the opinion in those cases, the Act of November 21, 1918, was and remained valid as against the plaintiff, and had not expired. For the same reason § 1 of title I. of the Act of October 28, 1919, was not invalid merely because it was new legislation. But it is insisted that this legislation is nevertheless void as against the plaintiff, because Congress could not, even under its full war powers, prohibit the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicants, and, at all events, could not, without making compensation, extend the prohibition to nonin-

NOTE (a):—

"The term 'War Prohibition Act' used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States. The words 'beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors' in the War Prohibition Act shall be hereafter construed to mean any other beverages which contain ½ of 1 per centum or more of alcohol by volume: Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter, or wine is produced, if it contains less than ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol by volume, and is made as prescribed in § 37 of title II. of this act, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in, or from, such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the Commissioner may by regulation prescribe."

toxicating liquor acquired before the passage of the act. These objections require consideration.

First: May the plaintiff show as a basis for relief that the beer manufactured by it with alcoholic content not greater than 2.75 per centum in weight and 3.4 per centum in volume is not in fact intoxicating? The government insists that the fact alleged is immaterial since the passage of the Volstead Act, by which the prohibition of the manufacture and sale is extended to all beer and other malt liquor containing as much as ½ of 1 per centum of alcohol by volume.

If the war power of Congress to effectively prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in order to promote the nation's efficiency in men, munitions, and supplies is as full and complete as the police power of the states to effectively enforce such prohibition in order to promote the health, safety, and morals of the community, it is clear that this provision of the Volstead Act is valid and has rendered immaterial the question whether plaintiff's beer is intoxicating. For the legislation and decisions of the highest courts of nearly all of the states establish that it is deemed impossible to effectively enforce either prohibitory laws or other laws merely regulating the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, if liability or inclusion within the law is made to depend upon the issuable fact whether or not a particular liquor made or sold as a beverage is intoxicating. In other words, it clearly appears [283] that a liquor law, to be capable of effective enforcement, must, in the opinion of the legislatures and courts of the several states, be made to apply either to all liquors of the species enumerated, like beer, ale, or wine, regardless of the presence or degree of alcoholic content; or, if a more general description is used, such as distilled, rectified, spirituous, fermented, malt, or brewed liquors, to all liquors within that general description, "regardless of alcoholic content;" or to such of these liquors as contain [284] a named percentage of alcohol; and often several such standards are combined so that certain specific and generic liquors are altogether forbidden and such other liquors as contain a given percentage of alcohol.

A test often used to determine whether a beverage is to be deemed intoxicating within the meaning of the liquor law is whether it contains ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. A survey of the liquor laws of the states reveals that in sixteen states the test is either a list of enumerated beverages without regard to whether they contain any alcohol, or the presence of any alcohol in a beverage, regardless of quantity;[c] in eighteen states

In Kansas, the legislature overruled this decision by Laws of 1909, chap. 164, § 4, see State v. Trione, 97 Kan. 365, 155 Pac. 29; in Minnesota made the prohibition apply to all malt liquors containing as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, Laws of 1919, chap. 455, p. 537; in North Dakota, by Laws of 1909, chap. 187, p. 277, see State v. Fargo Bottling Works Co. 19 N. D. 397, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 872, 124 N. W. 387, the prohibition applied to all liquors which retained "the alcoholic principle;" in Louisiana, Acts of 1914, Nos. 146, 211, operated to cut down the per cent of alcohol to 1.59; see State v. George, 136 La. 906, 67 So. 953. In Georgia, Acts of 1919, p. 931, changed the rule of Howard v. Acme Brewing Co. supra; see note (d) 4.

Note (o):—

1. Alabama:—Gen. Laws, Sp. Sess. 1907, No. 53, § 1, p. 71, made it unlawful to sell "any alcoholic, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, intoxicating beverages or bitters, or other liquors or beverages . . . which if drunk to excess will produce intoxication."

Marks v. State, 159 Ala. 71, 133 Am. St. Rep. 20, 48 So. 867, stated that "or other liquors or beverages which, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication," did not modify or limit the prohibition of the liquors enumerated. Any unenumerated liquor, however, must be proved to be intoxicating if drunk to excess.

Gen. Laws 1919, Act 7, p. 6, in terms prohibits all liquors containing any alcohol.

2. Arizona:—Constitution, art. 23, § 1, prohibits "ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquor, or liquors of whatever kind."

Brown v. State, 17 Ariz. 314, 152 Pac. 578, held that "beer" was prohibited whether or not it was intoxicating.

3. Arkansas:—Acts of 1917, Act 13, p. 41, as amended by Acts of 1919, Act 87, p. 75, prohibits "any alcoholic, vinous, malt, spirituous, or fermented liquors."

Seibert v. State, 121 Ark. 258, 180 S. W. 990, held that the enumerated liquors are prohibited whether they are intoxicating or not if they contained any alcohol.

An earlier act contained the words "or other intoxicating liquors" following "or fermented liquors." It was held in Bradshaw v. State, 76 Ark. 562, 89 S. W. 1051, that this clause did not modify the enumerated liquors, and that they were prohibited whether intoxicating or not.

4. Colorado:—Sess. Laws 1915, chap. 98, § 30—(prohibition)—as amended by Sess. Laws 1919, chap. 141, prohibits "intoxicating liquors . . . no matter how small the percentage of alcohol they may contain."

4½. Hawaii:—Rev. Laws 1915, § 2101 (License Law). "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . shall be held to include spirituous liquors, and any beverage in which may be found any percentage of distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol and alcoholic spirit as defined by the laws of the United States, and any sake, beer, lager beer, ale, porter and malt or fermented or distilled liquors."

5. Idaho:—Sess. Laws 1909, p. 18 (Local Option). "Spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors . . . and other drinks that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication."

Re Lockman, 18 Idaho, 465, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 759, 110 Pac. 253, held that the enumerated liquors are within the act, whether or not they are intoxicating.

Constitutional Amendment of November 7, 1916 (Prohibition). Sess. Laws 1917, p. 528. The Enforcement Laws are cumulative, including Sess. Laws 1915, chap. 28; Sess. Laws 1915, chap. 11 (see § 23); Sess. Laws 1911, chap. 15; and Sess. Laws 1909, p. 18. Thus the definition and interpretation above are retained.

6. Iowa:—Rev. Code (1897-1915) § 2382. Prohibits "any intoxicating liquor, which term shall be construed to mean alcohol, ale, wine, beer, spirituous, vinous, and malt liquor, and all intoxicating liquor whatever."

State v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 76 Iowa, 243, 2 L.R.A. 408, 41 N. W. 6 (1888) and State v. Colvin, 127 Iowa, 632, 103 N. W. 968 (1905); Sawyer v. Botti, 147 Iowa, 453, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1007, 124 N. W. 787 (1910), held that liquor containing any alcohol whatever is prohibited.

7. Kansas:—Laws of 1881, chap. 128, § 1 (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 5498). Prohibits "any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors."

Intoxicating-Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 37 Am. Rep. 284, held that in every case the question of the intoxicating quality of the beverage must go to the jury.

Laws of 1909, chap. 164, § 4 (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 5501), amended the Act of 1881 as follows: "All liquors mentioned in § 1 of this act shall be construed and held to be intoxicating within the meaning of this act."

State v. Miller, 92 Kan. 994, L.R.A.1917F, 238, 142 Pac. 979, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 365; State v. Trione, supra, declared that the former case is no longer the law, and that the mere presence of the liquors mentioned makes the substance intoxicating for purposes of the prohibition statutes.

See also Laws of 1917, chap. 215, 216, "Bone Dry Prohibition Law."

8. Maryland:—Laws of 1914, chap. 831, § 1, p. 1569 (Prohibition in Certain Counties), forbids "any spirituous, vinous, fermented, malt, or intoxicating liquors, or any mixture thereof containing alcohol for beverage purposes. . . ."

Laws of 1916, chap. 389, § 1, p. 786. Prohibits in a certain county "any kindred preparation or beverage, having the appearance or taste of lager beer . . . except those beverages that are labeled . . . stating that the beverage is free of alcohol."

See also Note d (9); and Note h. These citations are not exhaustive of the Maryland county prohibition statutes.

9. Michigan:—Public Acts 1919, No. 53, § 3, p. 81. "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . include any vinous, malt, brewed, fermented, or spirituous liquors . . . and all liquids . . . which contain any alcohol and are capable of being used as a beverage."

10. Mississippi:—Code of 1906, § 1746, as amended by Laws of 1908, chap. 115, p. 116 (Code 1917, § 2086). Prohibits the sale of "any vinous, alcoholic, malt, intoxicating, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating bitters, or other drinks which if drank to excess will produce intoxication."

Fuller v. Jackson, 97 Miss. 237, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1078, 52 So. 873; Purity Extract & Tonic Co. v. Lynch, 100 Miss. 650, 56 So. 316. All the enumerated drinks are prohibited whether they contain alcohol or are intoxicating or both or neither.

it [285] is the presence of as much as or more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol;[d]

Laws of 1918, chap. 189, § 1, p. 210. Prohibits "spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind."

11. New Mexico:—Stat. 1915, § 2874. "All persons who make for sale fermented liquors of any name or description from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be considered brewers." Sec. 2937. "The words 'intoxicating liquors' . . . include all malt, vinous, and spirituous liquors."

Constitutional Amendment, proposed by legislature of 1917, Laws of 1917, p. 352, prohibits "ardent spirits, ale, beer, alcohol, wine, or liquor of any kind whatsoever containing alcohol."

12. New York:—Laws of 1897, chap. 312, § 2; and Laws of 1903, chap. 486, § 2, as amended by Laws of 1905, chap. 679, § 2, defining intoxicating liquors as "all distilled, or rectified spirits, wine, fermented, and malt liquors."

People v. Cox, 106 App. Div. 299, 94 N. Y. Supp. 526, held that Malt Rose, containing .74 per cent of alcohol and made from malt, was within the meaning of the act.

People ex rel. Lanci v. O'Reilly, 129 App. Div. 522, 114 N. Y. Supp. 258, affirmed in 194 N. Y. 592, 88 N. E. 1128, holds that beer comes within the act, whether intoxicating or not, and declares that an earlier line of cases holding that the intoxicating quality is always for the jury to decide are no longer applicable where liquors are named in the act.

Laws of 1917, chap. 624, § 2, p. 1835. City Local Option Law. Continues the definition.

13. Ohio:—Rev. Stat. 1906, § 4364–9, laid a tax on the business of "trafficking in spirituous, vinous, malt, or any intoxicating liquors."

La Follette v. Murray, 81 Ohio St. 474, 91 N. E. 204, held that "Friedon Beer," a malt liquor containing .47 per cent of alcohol, and not intoxicating, was within the statute.

State v. Walder, 83 Ohio St. 68, 93 N. E. 531.

Laws of 1919, § 6212–15, p. 388 (Prohibition). ". . . 'liquor' and 'intoxicating liquors' include any distilled, malt, spirituous, vinous, fermented, or alcoholic liquor and also any alcoholic liquid . . . . which . . . capable of being used as a beverage."

14. South Dakota:—Sess. Laws of 1890, chap. 101, § 6, p. 229 (Prohibition), intoxicating liquors include "all spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, or mixtures . . . that will produce intoxication."

Rev. Pol. Code 1903, § 2834, requires a license to sell "any spirituous, vinous, malt, brewed, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors."

State v. Ely, 22 S. D. 487, 118 N. W. 687, 18 Ann. Cas. 92, held that the liquors named come within the act, whether or not they are intoxicating.

Rev. Code 1919, § 10,237. "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . include whisky, alcohol, brandy, gin, rum, wine, ale, beer, absinthe, cordials, hard or fermented cider, . . . and all distilled, spirituous, vinous, malt, brewed, and fermented liquors and every other liquid . . . containing alcohol . . . and is capable of being used as a beverage."

14½. United States:—Act of March 1, 1895, 28 Stat. at L. 697, § 8, chap. 145 (Indian Territory Prohibition), prohibits "any vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or any other intoxicating drinks."

United States v. Cohn, 2 Ind. Terr. 474, 52 S. W. 38, held that the act prohibits all malt liquors whether or not they are intoxicating.

See also Act of February 14, 1917, 39 Stat. at L. 903, chap. 53, Comp. Stat. § 3643b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 51 (Alaska Prohibition); and Act of March 3, 1917, 39 Stat. at L. 1123, chap. 165, Comp. Stat. § 3421¼a (District of Columbia Prohibition), both of which prohibit "all malt liquors."

15. Washington:—Code 1912, title 267, § 45 (Local Option). "'Intoxicating liquor' . . . shall include whisky, brandy, rum, wine, ale, beer, or any spirituous, vinous, fermented, malt or any other liquor containing intoxicating properties . . . except preparations compounded by a registered pharmacist, the sale of which would not subject him to the payment of the special liquor tax required by the laws of the United States."

Sess. Laws of 1915, chap. 2, § 2 (Prohibition). "'Intoxicating liquors' shall include whisky, etc., (as above) and all liquids . . . which contain any alcohol, which are capable of being used as a beverage."

16. Wisconsin:—Gen. Stat. 1911, § 1565c (Local Option), "any spirituous, malt, ardent, or intoxicating liquors or drinks."

Pennell v. State, 141 Wis. 35, 123 N. W. 115, holds that the statute forbids fermented malt liquors containing alcohol, whether intoxicating or not.

NOTE (d):—

1. Connecticut:—Public Acts 1919, chap. 241, p. 2917, defines intoxicating liquors, ". . . all beer manufactured from hops and malt or from hops and barley, and all beer on the receptacle containing which the laws of the United States require a revenue stamp to be affixed . . . [but it] . . . shall not include beverages which contain no alcohol, . . ."

2. Delaware:—Laws of 1917, chap. 10, p. 19 (Local Option Enforcement), defines as follows: . . . "all liquid mixtures . . . containing so much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume shall be deemed liquors and shall be embraced in the word 'liquor' as hereinafter used in this act."

3. Florida:—Acts of Sp. Sess. 1918, chap. 7736, § 7, as amended by Acts of 1919, chap. 7890, defines intoxicating liquor, which it prohibits, as all beverages containing "½ of 1 per cent of alcohol or more by volume."

4. Georgia:—Acts of 1915, Sp. Sess. pp. 77, 79 (Park's Anno. Code, Supp. 1917, Penal Code, § 448 (b)), defines "prohibited liquors" as ". . . beer, . . . near-beer, . . . and . . . beverages containing ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol or more by volume."

5. Illinois:—Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 43, § 1 ("Dram Shop Act"), defines a dram shop as a place "where spirituous or vinous or malt liquors are retailed . . . and intoxicating liquors shall be deemed to include all such liquors."

Hansberg v. State, 120 Ill. 21, 23, 60 Am. Rep. 549, 8 N. E. 857. Indictment for selling "intoxicating liquors." Proof of selling "beer." The court said: "No evidence whatever was offered or admitted for the purpose of explaining or showing what 'beer' was made of, or what its characteristics were, or whether it was malt, vinous, or intoxicating."

Laws of 1919, p. 931 (Search and Seizure Law). "'Intoxicating liquor' or 'liquors' shall include all distilled, spirituous, vinous, fermented or malt liquors which contain more than ½ of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol."

6. Indiana:—Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2094, "whoever . . . sells . . . any spirituous, vinous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors."

Kurz v. State, 79 Ind. 488, 490: "It devolves on the state, therefore, to prove that the beer sold was either a malt liquor, or that it was in fact an intoxicating liquor."

Laws of 1911, chap. 119, § 29 (Saloon Regulation Act). "The words 'intoxicating liquors' shall apply to any spirituous, vinous, or malt liquor, or to any intoxicating liquor whatever which is used . . . as a beverage and which contains more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

Laws of 1917, chap. 4, § 2 (Prohibition Act). "The words 'intoxicating liquor,' as used in this act, shall be construed to mean all malt, vinous, or spirituous liquor containing so much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

7. Maine:—Rev. Stat. 1916, chap. 127, § 21 (Prohibition Act), declares "wine, ale, porter, strong beer, lager beer, and all other malt liquors and cider when kept or deposited with intent to sell the same for tippling purposes. . . . are declared intoxicating within the meaning of this act."

State v. Piche, 98 Me. 348, 56 Atl. 1052, holds that in case of a liquor not enumerated, the jury must find the question of intoxicating quality.

Laws of 1919, chap. 235, § 21, prohibits "as well as any beverage containing a percentage of alcohol which by Federal enactment or by decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, now or hereafter declared, renders a beverage intoxicating."

8. Maryland:—Laws of 1917, Ex. Sess. chap. 13, § 1 (Prohibition in Prince George County). "Malt liquors shall be construed to embrace porter, ale, beer, and all malt or brewed drinks, whether intoxicating or not, containing as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume; and that the words 'intoxicating liquors' . . . shall . . . embrace both spirituous liquors and malt liquors and . . . all liquid mixtures, . . . containing so much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume." See also Note c (3), and Note h.

9. Minnesota:—Gen. Stat. 1913, § 3188, and Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, § 3161, provide that "the terms 'intoxicating liquor' and 'liquor' . . . shall include distilled, fermented, spirituous, vinous, and malt liquor."

State v. Gill, 89 Minn. 502, 95 N. W. 449, held that only those malt liquors which were intoxicating were within the meaning of the act.

Laws of 1919, chap. 455, p. 537 (Prohibition). "'Intoxicating liquor' and 'liquor' shall include and mean ethyl alcohol and any distilled, fermented, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquor or liquid of any kind potable as a beverage, whenever any of said liquors or liquids contain ½ of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume."

10. Missouri:—Rev. Stat. 1909, § 7243. "If a majority of the votes . . . shall be 'against the sale of intoxicating liquors,' it shall be unlawful for any person . . . (to sell) . . . any kind of intoxicating liquors or beverage containing alcohol in any quantity whatever."

State v. Gamma, 149 Mo. App. 694, 129 S. W. 734; State v. Burk, 151 Mo. App. 188, 131 S. W. 883; State v. Wills, 154 Mo. App 605, 136 S. W. 25.

Laws of 1919, chap. —, § 15. "The phrase 'intoxicating liquor' or 'intoxicating liquors' whenever used in this act shall be construed to mean and include any distilled, malt, spirituous, vinous, fermented, or alcoholic liquors, all alcoholic liquids . . . which contain ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume . . . ; Provided, however, that when the above-mentioned phrases . . . are defined in the laws of the United States, then such definition of Congress shall supersede and take the place of the definition . . . in this section."

11. Nebraska:—Cobbey's Compiled Stat. 1907, § 7161, forbids the sale of "malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors or any intoxicating drinks" without a license.

Luther v. State, 83 Neb. 455, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1146, 120 N. W. 125, holds that all malt liquors fall within the meaning of the statute, whether or not they are intoxicating.

Laws of 1917, chap. 187, § 1 (Prohibition). "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . embrace all malt, fermented, vinous or spirituous liquors, wine, porter, beer, ale, or any in six states, 1 per cent of alcohol; [e] in one state, the presence of the "alco-intoxicating drink, . . . and all malt or brewed drinks, and all mixtures . . . which will produce intoxication, and in addition thereto, such liquors of a different character and not hereinbefore enumerated capable of use as a beverage containing over ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

12. Nevada:—Laws of 1919, chap. 1, § 1 (Prohibition). "The words 'liquors' . . . shall embrace all malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, wine, porter, ale, beer, or any other intoxicating drink . . . , and all malt or brewed drinks, whether intoxicating or not, shall be deemed malt liquors within the meaning of this act . . . and all beverages containing so much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, shall be deemed spirituous liquors."

State ex rel. Thatcher v. Reno Brewing Co. 42 Nev. 397, 178 Pac. 902.

13. Oklahoma:—Sess. Laws of 1913, chap. 26, § 6, and Sess. Laws of 1917, chap. 186 (Prohibition), both define intoxicating liquors as "spirituous, vinous, fermented or malt liquors . . . or any liquors which contain as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

Estes v. State, 13 Okla. Crim. Rep. 604, 4 A.L.R. 1135, 166 Pac. 77, held that the state, to secure conviction for violation of the act, must prove either that the liquor contained more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol or that it was in fact intoxicating.

14. Oregon:—Laws of 1905, chap. 2 (Local Option), used only the term "intoxicating liquors."

State v. Carmody, 50 Or. 1, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 94 Pac. 446, 1081, held that the court will judicially recognize that "beer" is intoxicating in an indictment for selling "intoxicating liquors."

Laws of 1915, chap. 141, § 2, p. 151. "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . embrace all spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, and all mixtures . . . which contain in excess of ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume shall be deemed to be embraced within the term independently of any other test of their intoxicating character."

15. Tennessee:—Acts of 1917, chap. 4, p. 6 (Anno. Code 1918, § 6798a34). Clubs, etc., may not have on their premises any liquor "containing more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol."

16. Utah:—Laws of 1911, chap. 106, § 2; Laws of 1913, chap. 81, § 2 (License Laws), "any spirituous, vinous, fermented or malt liquor that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication."

Laws of 1917, chap. 2, § 2 (Prohibition). "'Liquors' . . . embrace all fermented, malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, alcohol, wine, porter, ale, beer, absinthe or any other intoxicating drink . . . and all malt or brewed drinks; and all liquids . . . which will produce intoxication; . . . and all beverages containing in excess of ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

17. Virginia:—Code of 1887, § 587 (Local Option), "any wine, spirituous or malt liquors, or any mixture thereof."

Savage v. Com. 84 Va. 582, and 619, 5 S. E. 563, 565, held that a sale of "ginger extract," in order to be illegal, requires the proof that the extract is intoxicating.

Acts of 1916, chap. 146, § 1, p. 216, "ardent spirits . . . embrace alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, wine, porter, ale, beer, all malt liquors, absinthe, and all compounds . . . ; and all beverages containing more than ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

18. West Virginia:—Code, chap. 32, § 1, as amended by Acts of 1877, chap. 107, prohibits the sale of "spirituous liquors, wine, porter, ale, beer, or any drink of a like nature . . . and all mixtures . . . known as 'bitters' . . . which will produce intoxication . . . shall be deemed intoxicating liquors."

State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 427, 53 Am. Rep. 79, in a dictum declares that beer is prohibited whether it is intoxicating beer or not.

Code of 1906, chap. 32, § 1, is substantially the same.

"State v. Henry, 74 W. Va. 72, 4 A.L.R. 1132, 81 S. E. 569, on indictment for selling 'intoxicating liquors' held that evidence of sale of 'bevo' containing 1.31 per cent of alcohol sufficient to sustain a conviction."

Acts of 1913, chap. 13, § 1. "'Liquors' . . . embrace all malt, vinous, spirituous or liquors, wine, porter, ale, beer, or any other intoxicating drink . . . ; and all malt or brewed drinks whether intoxicating or not shall be deemed malt liquors . . . and all beverages containing so much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

NOTE (e):—

1. California:—Stat. 1911, chap. 351, § 21 (Local Option and License). "'Alcoholic liquors' . . . include spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and any other liquor . . . which contains 1 per cent" of alcohol or more.

People v. Strickler, 25 Cal. App. 60, 142 Pac. 1121, held that the clause "and any other liquor which shall contain 1 per cent of alcohol or more" modified the enumerated liquors, so that a malt liquor containing less than 1 per cent of alcohol, and not intoxicating, did not fall within the act.

2. Massachusetts:—Rev. Laws 1902, chap. 100, § 2 (Local Option and License). "Ale, porter, strong beer, lager beer, cider, all wines, any beverage which contains more than 1 per cent of alcohol by volume . . . shall be deemed to be intoxicating."

Com. v. McGrath, 185 Mass. 1, 69 N. E. 340, held that cider fell within the act, whether it contained 1 per cent of alcohol or was intoxicating or neither.

Com. v. Blos, 116 Mass. 56, held that a liquor not enumerated in the statute is not prohibited unless it falls within the general definition, which is a question for the jury.

Supp. to Rev. Laws, 1908, chap. 100, § 1, retains the same definition.

3. New Hampshire:—Gen. Laws 1878, chap. 109, § 15, restricted the sale of "lager beer or other malt liquors."

State v. Thornton, 63 N. H. 114, held that all malt liquors come within the meaning of the act, whether or not they are intoxicating.

Supp. to Pub. Stat. and Sess. Laws 1901–1913, p. 7, defines intoxicating liquors as "all distilled liquors or rectified spirits; vinous, fermented, brewed and malt liquors; and any beverage . . . containing more than 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

Laws of 1917, chap. 147, § 60 (Prohibition). "By the words spirit, liquor, spirituous liquor, intoxicating liquor . . . (is meant) . . . all distilled spirits or rectified spirits; vinous, fermented, brewed and malt liquors; and any beverage . . . containing more than 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

4. South Carolina:—Rev. Stat. 1893, Crim. Stat. § 437; Code 1902, Crim. Code, § 555; Code 1912, Crim. Code, § 794, prohibit any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, brewed or other liquors and beverages, or any compound or mixture thereof which contains alcohol.

Acts of 1917, No. 94, prohibits "any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, brewed, or other liquors and beverages, or any compound or mixture thereof which contains alcohol in excess of 1 per cent."

5. Vermont:—Rev. Laws 1880, § 3800, prohibited the sale of cider at places of amusement.

State v. Spaulding, 61 Vt. 505, 17 Atl. 844, held that the prohibition covered all cider, whether intoxicating or not.

Laws of 1902, No. 90, § 1, p. 94 (Gen. Laws 1917, § 6452). "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . shall mean ale, porter, beer, lager beer, cider, all wines, and beverage which contains more than 1 per cent of alcohol by volume."

6. Wyoming:—Comp. Stat. 1910, § 2838. "Any person who shall sell . . . any liquors, either spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt, without a license, etc."

Sess. Laws of 1919, chap. 25, § 2 (Prohibition). "'Intoxicating liquor' . . . include any distilled, malt, spirituous, vinous, fermented, or alcoholic liquor and all alcoholic liquids . . . capable of being used as a beverage, which shall contain more than 1 per cent of alcohol."

NOTE (f):—

North Dakota:—Rev. Code 1895, § 7598, contains a proviso to the effect that fermented and alcoholic liquors containing less than 2 per cent of alcohol by volume shall not be deemed to be intoxicating.

Laws of 1897, chap. 65, § 10. "Courts will take judicial notice that beer is a malt liquor and intoxicating."

State v. Currie, 8 N. D. 545, 80 N. W. 475 (1899), held that the statute meant that beer is to be presumed to be intoxicating until proved not to be so.

Rev. Code 1899, § 7598, prohibits "all spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors or mixtures thereof . . . that produce intoxication, or any liquors sold as a beverage and which contain . . . methyl alcohol, amyl alcohol, etc."

State v. Virgo, 14 N. D. 293, 103 N. W. 610 (1905), held that the act only applied to such liquors as were in fact intoxicating.

Laws of 1909, chap. 187, p. 277. Intoxicating liquors include alcohol, brandy, rum, beer, ale, porter, wine, and hard cider, also all spirituous, malt, etc., liquors, which will produce intoxication in any degree; or any mixture of such or any kind of beverage whatsoever which, while preserving the alcoholic principle or any other intoxicating quality, may be used as a beverage and may become a substitute for the ordinary intoxicating beverages.

State v. Fargo Bottling Works Co. 19 N. D. 397, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 872, 124 N. W. 387, held that "Purity Malt," containing 1.75 per cent of alcohol, "preserved the alcoholic principle," and whether or not it was intoxicating, it might not lawfully be sold.

NOTE (g):—

1. Louisiana:—Shreveport Ice & Brewing Co. v. Brown, 128 La. 408, 54 So. 923, held that a statute regulating the sale of "spirituous and intoxicating liquors" includes only intoxicating liquors.

Acts of Extra Session, 1910, No. 171, defines "grog-shop" as a place where "intoxicating, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are sold" (and forbids them in prohibition territory).

State v. Maroun, 128 La. 829, 55 So. 472, held that the malt liquors must be intoxicating to be within the meaning of the statute.

Acts of 1914, No. 146, repeats a similar definition of grog-shop or blind tiger. Acts of 1914, No. 211, forbids the manufacture of near-beer with more than 1.59 per cent of alcohol by weight or 2 per cent by volume; and prohibits the sale of the near-beer thus made under the same roof where any other beverage is sold.

State v. George, 136 La. 906, 67 So. 953, seems to hold that this near-beer may be sold in prohibition territory where the "grog-shops" are not allowed.

2. Montana:—Laws of 1917, chap. 143, § 2. "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . include whisky, brandy, gin, rum, wine, ale, and spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors or liquid . . . which contain as much as 2 per cent of alcohol by volume and is capable of being used as a beverage."

State v. Centennial Brewing Co. 35 Mont. 500, 179 Pac. 296, holds specifically mentioned liquors prohibited regardless of alcoholic content.

deemed, for the purpose of regulation or prohibition, intoxicating as a [287] matter of law. Only one state has adopted a test as high as 2.75 per cent by weight or 3.4 per cent by volume.[h] Only two states permit the question of the intoxicating character of an enumerated liquor to be put in issue.[i] In [288] three other states the matter has not been made clear either by decision or legislation.[j] The decisions of the courts as well as the action of the legislatures make it clear—or, at least, furnish ground upon which Congress [289] reasonably might conclude—that a rigid classification of beverages is an essential of either effective regulation or effective prohibition of intoxicating liquors.[k]

Purity Extract & Tonic Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, 57 L. ed. 184, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44, determined that state legislation of this character is valid, and set forth [290] with clearness the constitutional ground upon which it rests: "When a state, exerting its recognized authority, undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make [291] its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction separately considered is innocuous, it may not be included in a prohibition the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a [292] purpose within the admitted power of the government. [P. 201.] . . . It was competent for the legislature of Mississippi to recognize the difficulties besetting the administration of laws aimed at the prevention of traffic in intoxicants. [293] It prohibited, among other things, the sale of 'malt liquors.' In thus dealing with a class of Rhode Island:—Pub. Laws of 1887, chap. 634, § 2. "'Intoxicating liquors' . . . include wine, rum, or other strong, or malt liquors, or any liquor or mixture which shall contain more than 2 per cent by weight of alcohol," and this is not to be construed to permit the sale of liquors containing less than 2 per cent if intoxicating.

Public Laws 1919, chap. 1740, § 1 (amending Gen. Laws, chap. 123, § 1). "'Nonintoxicating beverages' as used in this act, includes and means all distilled or rectified spirits, wines, fermented and malt liquors which contain 1 per centum and not more than 4 per centum by weight of alcohol. . . .

"Sec. 2. No person shall manufacture or sell or suffer to be manufactured or sold, or keep or suffer to be kept on his premises or possessions or under his charge for the purposes of sale and delivery, any nonintoxicating beverages, unless as hereinafter provided. . . .

"Sec. 5. The electors of the several cities and towns . . . shall . . . cast their ballots for or against the granting of licenses for the sale of nonintoxicating beverages pursuant to this act. . . ."

Maryland:—Laws of 1918, chap. 219, p. 580 (prohibiting at night the sale of intoxicating liquors to be carried away from the place of sale). Expressly excludes from the operation of the act "malt liquors containing less than 4 per cent of alcohol by weight."

This provision, however, is not attempting to make a classification of intoxicating liquors. For laws of this state which do that, see Note c (7) and Note d (9).

NOTE (i):—

1. Kentucky:—Statutes of 1903, § 2554, as amended by Laws of 1906, chap. 21, forbids the sale in dry territory of "spirituous, vinous or malt liquors." Bowling Green v. McMullen, 134 Ky. 742, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 895, 122 S. W. 823, held that the liquors named must be intoxicating in fact to be forbidden by the act.

2. Texas:—Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 5060a, taxes the selling of "spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or medicated bitters capable of producing intoxication."

Ex parte Gray, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 83 S. W. 828; Reisenberg v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 84 S. W. 585, held that nonintoxicating malt beverages may be sold without a license.

Gen. Laws 1918, chap. 24 (Prohibition), uses the same terms as the older statute and is cumulative, so presumably it has the same meaning.

3. Louisiana:—See Note f (1). The test of 2 per cent applies only to near-beer. Presumably a vinous liquor must be proved intoxicating in fact under the decisions.

NOTE (j):—

1. New Jersey:—Laws of 1918, chap. 2, § 1 (Local Option). "The term 'intoxicating liquor' . . . shall mean any spirituous, vinous, malt, brewed, or any other intoxicating liquor."

2. North Carolina:—Sp. Sess. 1908, chap. 71, § 1. Prohibits the sale of "any spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors, or intoxicating bitters."

Pub. Laws 1909, chap. 438, Schedule B, §§ 26 and 63, imposed a license tax on the sale of "near-beer or any drinks containing ½ of 1 per cent alcohol or more."

Parker v. Griffith, 151 N. C. 600, 66 S. E. 565; State v. Danenberg, 151 N. C. 718, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 890, 66 S. E. 301, held that the sale of near-beer containing 1½ per cent of alcohol was lawful.

beverages which in general are regarded as intoxicating, it was not bound to resort to a discrimination with respect to ingredients and processes of manufacture which, in the endeavor [294] to eliminate innocuous beverages from the condemnation, would facilitate subterfuges and frauds and fetter the enforcement of the law. A contrary conclusion logically pressed would save the nominal power while preventing its effective exercise. [P. 204.] . . . The state, [295] within the limits we have stated, must decide upon the measures that are needful for the protection of its people, and, having regard to the artifices which are used to promote the sale of intoxicants under the guise of innocent [296] beverages, it would constitute an unwarrantable departure from accepted principle to hold that the prohibition of the sale of all malt liquors, including the beverage in question, was beyond its reserved power." P. 205.

[297] That the Federal government would, in attempting to enforce a prohibitory law, be confronted with difficulties similar to those encountered by the states, is obvious; and both this experience of the states and the need of the Federal government of legislation defining intoxicating liquors, as was done in the Volstead Act, was clearly set forth in the reports of the House Committee on the Judiciary in reporting the bill to the 65th Congress, 3d Session, Report 1143, February 26, 1919, and to the 66th Congress, 1st Session, Report 91, June 30, 1919. Furthermore, recent experience of the military forces had shown the necessity [298] of fixing a definite alcoholic test for the purpose of administering the limited prohibitory law included in the Selective Service Act of May 18, 1917, chap. 15, § 12, 40 Stat. at L. 76, 82, Comp. Stat. § 2019a.[l] And the Attorney General, calling attention specifically to the claim made in respect to the 2.75 per cent beer, had pointed out to Congress that definition of intoxicating liquor by fixed standards was essential to effective enforcement of the Prohibition Law.[m] It is therefore [299] clear both that Congress might reasonably have considered some legislative definition of intoxicating liquor to be essential to effective enforcement of prohibition, and also that the definition provided by the Volstead Act was not an arbitrary one.

Plaintiff's argument is equivalent to saying that the war power of Congress to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors does not extend to the adoption of such means to this end as in its judgment are necessary to the

That statute made it "unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform." The Judge Advocate General having been applied to for an opinion concerning its administration advised that: In matters of military inquiry, the War Department regards a beverage that contains 1.4 per cent of alcohol as intoxicating liquor within the meaning of § 12 of the Selective Service Act of May 18, 1917, and the regulations of the President and the Secretary of War made thereunder; whether beverages are intoxicating liquors . . . in prosecution of civilians is a question for the civil courts. Opinions of Judge Advocate General, 250. Dec. 4, 1918—Digest of 1918, p. 360. See also Opinion of March 3, 1919—Digest of 1919, p. 289.

NOTE (m):—
Referring to the proposed definition: "I do not think the wisdom of such action on the part of Congress admits of doubt: It goes without saying, I think, that if a law merely prohibits intoxicating liquors and leaves to the jury in each case, from the evidence produced, to determine whether the liquor in question is, in fact, intoxicating or not, its efficient and uniform administration will be impossible. The term 'intoxicating' is too indefinite and uncertain to produce anything like uniform results in such trials. Of course, there are certain liquors so generally known to be intoxicating that any court would take judicial notice of this fact. But in the absence of a definition by Congress there will be innumerable beverages as to which the claim will be made that they do not contain enough alcohol to render them intoxicating. These contentions will produce endless confusion and uncertainty. These, I think, are substantially the reasons why Congress should itself provide a definition.

"The importance of this matter has been very much emphasized by our present efforts to enforce the War Prohibition Act. The claim is being made that beer containing as much as 2¾ per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating. And if this must be made a question of fact to be decided by each jury, but little in the way of practical results can be expected. I am, however, most earnestly insisting that, in view of the rulings for many years by the Internal Revenue Department, Congress meant when it used the word 'beer' a beverage of the class generally known as beer if it contained as much as ½ of 1 per cent of alcohol." Letter of Attorney General to Senator Morris Shepherd, July 23, 1919, read in Senate, September 5, 1919, 58 Congressional Record, 5185.

effective administration of the law. The contention appears to be, that since the power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is not expressly granted to Congress, but is a power implied under § 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" powers expressly enumerated, the power to prohibit nonintoxicants would be merely an incident of the power to prohibit intoxicants; and that it cannot be held to exist, because one implied power may not be grafted upon another implied power. This argument is a mere matter of words. The police power of a state over the liquor traffic is not limited to the power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, supported by a separate implied power to prohibit kindred nonintoxicating liquors so far as necessary to make the prohibition of intoxicants effective; it is a single broad power to make such laws, by way of prohibition, as may be required to effectively suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Likewise the implied [300] war power over intoxicating liquors extends to the enactment of laws which will not merely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, but will effectually prevent their sale. Furthermore, as stated in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. [251 U. S. 146, ante, 194, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106], while discussing the implied power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors: "When the United States exerts any of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, no valid objection can be based upon the fact that such exercise may be attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise by a state of its police power."

The distinction sought to be made by plaintiff between the scope or incidents of an express power and those of an implied power has no basis in reason or authority. Thus, the Constitution confers upon Congress the express power "to establish postoffices and post roads" (art. 1, § 8, clause 7). From this is implied the power to acquire land for postoffices in the several states (Battle v. United States, 209 U. S. 36, 52 L. ed. 679, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 422); and as an incident of this implied power to acquire land, the further power is implied to take it by right of eminent domain (Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367, 23 L. ed. 449). Likewise, the Constitution confers by clause 3 the express power "to regulate commerce among the several states;" but there is implied for this purpose also the power to grant to individuals franchises to construct and operate railroads from state to state (California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 39, 32 L. ed. 150, 157, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073). Incidental to this implied power to construct or authorize the construction of a railroad is the further implied power to regulate the relations of the railroad with its employees (Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.) 223 U. S. 1, 47, 56 L. ed. 327, 345, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, 1 N. C. C. A. 875); to require safety appliances upon cars, even when used in intrastate commerce (Southern R. Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20, 56 L. ed. 72, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2, 3 N. C. C. A. 822); and to regulate freight rates even to the extent of affecting intrastate rates (American Exp. Co. v. South Dakota, 244 U. S. 617, 61 L. ed. 1352, P.U.R.1917F, 45, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656). Whether it be for purposes of national defense, or for the purpose [301] of establishing postoffices and post roads, or for the purpose of regulating commerce among the several states, Congress has the power "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the duty so reposed in the Federal government. While this is a government of enumerated powers, it has full attributes of sovereignty within the limits of those powers. Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 39 L. ed. 1092, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900. Some confusion of thought might perhaps have been avoided, if, instead of distinguishing between powers by the term "express and implied," the term "specific and general," had been used. For the power conferred by clause 18 of § 8 "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" powers specifically enumerated is also an express power. Since Congress has power to increase war efficiency by prohibiting the liquor traffic, no reason appears why it should be denied the power to make its prohibition effective.

Second: Does the fact that title 1 of the Volstead Act took effect upon its passage render § 1 invalid as against the plaintiff? Prohibition of the manufacture of malt liquors with alcoholic content of ½ of 1 per cent or more is permissible only because, in the opinion of Congress, the war emergency demands it. If, in its opinion, the particular emergency demands the immediate discontinuance of the traffic, Congress must have the power to require such discontinuance. To limit the power of Congress so that it may require discontinuance only after the lapse of a reasonable time from the passage of the act would seriously restrict it in the exercise of the war powers. Hardship resulting from making an act take effect upon its passage is a frequent incident of permissible legislation; but whether it shall be imposed rests wholly in the discretion of the law-making body. That the prohibition of the manufacture of nonintoxicating beer, if permissible at all, may be made to take effect immediately, follows necessarily from the principle acted upon in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 [302] U. S. 623, 669, 31 L. ed. 205, 213, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, since the incidents attending the exercise by Congress of the war power to prohibit the liquor traffic are the same as those that attend the states' prohibition under the police power. In the Mugler Case, also, the breweries were erected at a time when the state did not forbid the manufacture of malt liquors; and there it was alleged that the prohibition, which became effective almost immediately, would reduce the value of one of the breweries by three fourths and would render the other of little value. Here, as there, the loss resulting to the plaintiff from inability to use the property for brewery purposes is an incident of the peculiar nature of the property and of the war need which, we must assume, demanded that the discontinuance of use be immediate. Plaintiff cannot complain because a discontinuance later would have caused him a smaller loss. This, indeed, appears to be conceded so far as concerns the brewery and appurtenances. The objection on the ground that the prohibition takes effect immediately is confined to the prohibition of the sale of the beer on hand at the time of the passage of the act. But as to that also we cannot say that the action of Congress was unreasonable or arbitrary.

Plaintiff contends, however, that even if immediate prohibition of the sale of its nonintoxicating beer is within the war power, this can be legally effected only provided compensation is made; and it calls attention to the fact that in Barbour v. Georgia, 249 U. S. 454, 459, 63 L. ed. 704, 707, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 316, following some earlier cases, the question was reserved whether, under the police power, the states could prohibit the sale of liquor acquired before the enactment of the statute. It should, however, be noted that, among the judgments affirmed in the Mugler Case, was one for violation of the act by selling beer acquired before its enactment (see pp. 625, 627); and that it was assumed without discussion that the same rule applied to the brewery and its product (p. 669). But we are not required to determine here the limits [303] in this respect of the police power of the states; nor whether the principle is applicable here under which the Federal government has been declared to be free from liability to an owner "for private property injured or destroyed during the war, by operations of armies in the field, or by measures necessary to their safety and efficiency" (United States v. Pacific R. Co. 120 U. S. 227, 239, 30 L. ed. 634, 638, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490); in analogy to that by which states are exempt from liability for the demolition of a house in the path of a conflagration, see Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 136, 38 L. ed. 385, 388, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499; or for garbage of value taken, California Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works, 199 U. S. 306, 50 L. ed. 204, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100; Gardner v. Michigan, 199 U. S. 325, 50 L. ed. 212, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106; or for unwholesome food of value destroyed. (North American Cold Storage Co. v. Chicago, 211 U. S. 306, 53 L. ed. 195, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 101, 15 Ann. Cas. 276; Adams v. Milwaukee, 228 U. S. 572, 584, 57 L. ed. 971, 977, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610) for the preservation of the public health. Here, as in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. supra, there was no appropriation of private property, but merely a lessening of value due to a permissible restriction imposed upon its use.

It is urged that the act is particularly oppressive in respect to the beer on hand, because the plaintiff was engaged in manufacturing and selling a nonintoxicating beverage expressly authorized by the President in his Proclamation of December 8, 1917 [40 Stat. at L. 84], and prohibited by him later, only when conservation of all the food products of the country became necessary. The facts afford no basis on which to rest the claim of an equity in the plaintiff's favor. The specific permission from the President to manufacture 2.75 per cent beer was not on the ground that such beer was nonintoxicating; nor was it a declaration by him that this beer was in fact nonintoxicating. The permission extended to all "ale and porter," which.

everyone knows, are intoxicating liquors."[n] This permission to [304] make 2.75 per cent beer was withdrawn December 1, 1918, under proclamation of September 16, 1918 [40 Stat. at L. 204]; and no permission to manufacture specifically 2.75 per cent beer was ever thereafter given by the President. His later proclamation (March 4, 1919 [40 Stat. at L. 293]) merely limited the prohibition of the use of foodstuffs to use in the production of "intoxicating liquors." Whether 2.75 per cent beer was intoxicating was thus left by the President not only without a decision, but without even an intimation. The statement of plaintiff that the 2.75 per cent beer on hand was manufactured under permission of the President is wholly unfounded. It was not until July 1, 1919, when the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918 [40 Stat. at L. 1045, chap. 212] became operative in this respect that there was any prohibition of the sale of any liquors. So far as appears, all the beer which the plaintiff had on hand at the time of the passage of the Volstead Act was manufactured by the plaintiff long after the President had ceased to have any authority to forbid or to permit.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Van Devanter, dissenting:

I cannot accept either the conclusion announced by the court or the reasons advanced to uphold it. The importance of the principles involved impels a dissent.

We are not now primarily concerned with the wisdom or validity of general legislation concerning liquors, nor with the intoxicating qualities of beer, nor with measures taken by a state under its inherent and wide general powers to provide for public safety and welfare. Our problem concerns the power of Congress and rights of the citizen after a declaration of war, but when active [305] hostilities have ended and demobilization has been completed.

The government freely admits, since the present cause stands upon motion to dismiss a bill which plainly alleges that the beer in question is nonintoxicating, we must accept that allegation as true and beyond controversy. In United States v. Standard Brewery, decided this day [251 U. S. 210, ante, 229, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139], we rule in effect that for many months prior to the Volstead Act, passed October 28, 1919, no law of the United States forbade the production or sale of nonintoxicating malt liquors. And so the question for decision here distinctly presented is this: Did Congress have power on October 28, 1919, directly and instantly to prohibit the sale of a noninfoxicating beverage, theretofore lawfully produced and which until then could have been lawfully vended, without making any provision for compensation to the owner?

The Federal government has only those powers granted by the Constitution. The 18th Amendment not having become effective, it has no general power to prohibit the manufacture or sale of liquors. But by positive grant Congress has been empowered: "To declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers;" and to these it is attempted to trace the asserted power to prohibit sale of complainant's beer. See, concerning implied powers, Cooley, Const. Law, 105; Story, Const. 4th ed. § 1243.

The argument runs: This court has held in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. (decided December 8th) [251 U. S. 146, ante, 194, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106], that under a power implied because necessary and proper to carry into execution the above-named powers relating to war, in October, 1919, Congress could prohibit the sale [306] of intoxicating liquors. In order to make such a prohibition effective the sale of nonintoxicating beer must be forbidden. Wherefore, from the implied power to prohibit intoxicants the further power to prohibit this nonintoxicant must be implied.

The query at once arises: If all this be true, why may not the second implied power engender a third, under which Congress may forbid the planting of barley or hops, the manufacture of bottles or kegs, etc., etc.? The mischievous consequences of such reasoning were long ago pointed out in Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 21, 32 L. ed. 346, 350, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, where, replying to a suggestion that under the expressly granted power to regulate commerce, Congress might control related matters, it was said:

"The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the states, with the power to regulate not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining,—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market?"

For sixty years Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 120, 125, 18 L. ed. 281, 295, 297, has been regarded as a splendid exemplification of the protection which this court must extend in time of war to rights guaranteed by the Constitution, and also as decisive of its power to ascertain whether actual military necessity justifies interference with such rights. The doctrines then clearly—I may add, courageously—announced conflict with the novel and hurtful theory now promulgated. A few pertinent quotations from the opinion will accentuate the gravity of the present ruling:

"Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than seventy years, sought to be avoided. Those great and [307] good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence; as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

"This nation, as experience has proved, cannot always remain at peace, and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers, sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln; and if this right is conceded, and the calamities of war again befall us, the dangers to human liberty are frightful to contemplate. If our fathers had failed to provide for just such a contingency, they would have been false to the trust reposed in them. They knew—the history of the world told them—the nation they were founding, be its existence short or long, would be involved in war; how often or how long continued, human foresight could not tell; and that unlimited power, wherever lodged [308] at such a time, was especially hazardous to freemen. For this, and other equally weighty reasons, they secured the inheritance they had fought to maintain, by incorporating in a written constitution the safeguards which time had proved were essential to its preservation. Not one of these safeguards can the President, or Congress, or the Judiciary disturb, except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus."

By considering the circumstances existing when the War-time Prohibition Act of November 21, 1918 [40 Stat. at L. 1045, chap. 212], was challenged, in order to reach the conclusion announced in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. supra, this court asserted its right to determine the relationship between such an enactment and the conduct of war; the decision there really turned upon an appreciation of the facts. And that the implied power to enact such a prohibitive statute does not spring from a mere technical state of war, but depends upon some existing necessity directly related to actual warfare, was recognized. Treating that opinion as though it asserted the existence of a general power delegated to Congress to prohibit intoxicants, certain cases which declare our inability to interfere with a state in the exercise of its police power (Purity Extract & Tonic Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, 57 L. ed. 184, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44; New York ex rel. Silz v. Hesterberg, 211 U. S. 31, etc., 53 L. ed. 75, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10) are now cited, and it is said they afford authority for upholding the challenged statute. But those cases are essentially different from the present one, both as to facts and applicable principles; the power exercised by the states was inherent, ever present, limited only by the 14th Amendment, and there was no arbitrary application of it; the power of Congress recognized in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., and here relied upon, must be inferred from others expressly granted, and should be restricted, as it always has been heretofore, to actual necessities consequent upon war. It can only support a measure directly relating to such necessities, and only so long as the relationship continues. Whether these [309] essentials existed when a measure was enacted or challenged, presents a question for the courts; and, accordingly, we must come to this ultimate inquiry:—Can it be truthfully said, in view of the well-known facts existing on October 28, 1919, that general prohibition immediately after that day of the sale of nonintoxicating beer theretofore lawfully manufactured could afford any direct and appreciable aid in respect of the war declared against Germany and Austria?

What were the outstanding circumstances? During the nineteen months—April, 1917, to November, 1918—when active hostilities were being carried on, and for almost a year thereafter, Congress found no exigency requiring it to prohibit sales of nonintoxicating beers. The armistice was signed and actual hostilities terminated November 11, 1918. Our military and naval forces, with very few exceptions, had returned and demobilization had been completed. The production of war material and supplies had ceased long before and huge quantities of those on hand had been sold. The President had solemnly declared: "The war thus comes to an end; for having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it." Also—"That the object of the war is attained." "The quiet of peace and tranquillity of settled hopes has descended upon us." July 10, 1919, he announced: "The war ended in November, eight months ago;" and in a message dated October 27, 1919, he declared that war emergencies which might have called for prohibition "have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy." Food supplies were abundant, and there is no pretense that the enactment under consideration was intended to preserve them. Finally, the statute itself contains no declaration that prohibition of nonintoxicants was regarded as in any way essential to the proper conduct or conclusion of the war or to restoration of peace.

[310] Giving consideration to this state of affairs I can see no reasonable relationship between the war declared in 1917, or the demobilization following (both of which in essence if not by formal announcement terminated before October, 1919), or restoration of peace (whose quiet had already descended upon us), and destruction of the value of complainant's beverage, solemnly admitted in this record to be nonintoxicating, and which it manufactured, held, and desired to sell in strict compliance with the laws of New York. Nor can I discover any substantial ground for holding that such destruction could probably aid in an appreciable way the enforcement of any prohibition law then within the competency of Congress to enact. It is not enough merely to assert such a probability; it must arise from the facts.

Moreover, well-settled rights of the individual in harmless property and powers carefully reserved to the states ought not to be abridged or destroyed by mere argumentation based upon supposed analogies. The Constitution should be interpreted in view of the spirit which pervades it, and always with a steadfast purpose to give complete effect to every part according to the true intendment,—none should suffer emasculation by any strained or unnatural construction. And these solemn words we may neither forget nor ignore: "Nor shall any person . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." [5th Amend.] "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." [10th Amend.]

[No. —, Original.]

Argued January 5, 1920. Decided January 12, 1920.

ON RULE to show cause why leave should not be granted to a citizen of New Jersey to file an original bill against Federal officers and the State of New Jersey, to enjoin the enforcement of the 18th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Rule discharged.

Mr. Everett V. Abbot argued the cause, and, with Messrs. George W. Tucker, Benjamin Tuska, and Edward Hollander, filed a brief for complainant:

The state of New Jersey may be sued in this court as a sovereign entity.

Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. 109 U. S. 446, 451, 27 L. ed. 992, 994, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 292, 609; Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257.

Mr. Thomas F. McCran, Attorney General of New Jersey, argued the cause and filed a brief for the state of New Jersey:

The state of New Jersey cannot compulsorily be made a suitor in an original action in the Supreme Court of the United States, instituted by a citizen of said state.

Louisiana v. Texas, 176 U. S. 16, 44 L. ed. 353, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 251; California v. Southern P. Co. 157 U. S. 229, 39 L. ed. 683, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591; Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. Rep. 269; Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 846, 6 L. ed. 229.

Solicitor General King argued the cause, and, with Assistant Attorney General Frierson, filed a brief for defendants other than the state of New Jersey:

As to controversies between a state and citizens of other states, the 11th Amendment denies to the United States court jurisdiction where such suit is brought against the state as a defendant.

Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S. 1, 15, 33 L. ed. 842, 847, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504.

The United States cannot be sued in any court except when it has consented thereto.

Generally, on suits against a state—see notes to Hans v. Louisiana, 33 L. ed. U. S. 842; Beers v. Arkansas, 15 L. ed. U. S. 991; Carr v. State, 11 L.R.A. 370; and Murdock Parlor Grate Co. v. Com. 8 L.R.A. 399.

District of New Jersey, as well as against the state of New Jersey. The bill sought an injunction restraining the United States officials named and the state of New Jersey, its officers and agents, from in any manner directly or indirectly enforcing the 18th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, any law of Congress or statute of the state to the contrary, on the ground that that amendment was void from the beginning and formed no part of the Constitution.

Answering a rule to show cause why leave to file the bill should not be granted, if any there was, the defendants, including the state of New Jersey, denied the existence of jurisdiction to entertain the cause, and this is the first question for consideration.

So far as the controversy concerns the officials of the United States, it is obvious that the bill presents no question within the original jurisdiction of this court, and in effect that is not disputed, since in substance it is conceded that the bill would not present a case within our original jurisdiction if it were not for the presence of the state of New Jersey as a defendant. But it has been long since settled that the whole sum of the judicial power granted by the Constitution to the United States does not embrace the authority to entertain a suit brought by a citizen against his own state without its consent. Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S. 1, 33 L. ed. 82, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504; North Carolina v. Temple, 134 U. S. 22, 33 L. ed. 849, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 509; California v. Southern P. Co. 157 U. S. 229, 39 L. ed. 683, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591; Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S. 516, 524, 43 L. ed. 535, 539, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269.

It is urged, however, that although this may be the general rule, it is not true as to the original jurisdiction of this court, since the second clause of § 2, article 3, of the Constitution, confers original jurisdiction upon this court "in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, . . ." In [314] other words the argument is that the effect of the clause referred to is to devest every state of an essential attribute of its sovereignty by subjecting it without its consent to be sued in every case if only the suit is originally brought in this court. Here again the error arises from treating the language of the clause as creative of jurisdiction instead of confining it to its merely distributive significance according to the rule long since announced, as follows: "This second clause distributes the jurisdiction conferred in the previous one into original and appellate jurisdiction, but does not profess to confer any. The original jurisdiction depends solely on the character of the parties, and is confined to the cases in which are those enumerated parties, and those only." Louisiana v. Texas, 176 U. S. 1, 16, 44 L. ed. 347, 353, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 251. That is to say, the fallacy of the contention consists in overlooking the fact that the distribution which the clause makes relates solely to the grounds of Federal jurisdiction previously conferred, and hence solely deals with cases in which the original jurisdiction of this court may be resorted to in the exercise of the judicial power as previously given. In fact, in view of the rule now so well settled as to be elementary, that the Federal jurisdiction does not embrace the power to entertain a suit brought against a state without its consent, the contention now insisted upon comes to the proposition that the clause relied upon provides for the exercise by this court of original jurisdiction in a case where no Federal judicial power is conferred.

As the want of jurisdiction to entertain the bill clearly results, it follows that the permission to file must be and it is denied, and our order is, rule discharged.

Commerce — conflicting state and Federal regulations — interstate telegrams — prompt delivery.

2. Congress has so far taken possession of the field by enacting the provisions of the Act of June 18, 1910, bringing telegraph companies under the Act to Regulate Commerce, as well as placing them under the administrative control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to prevent a state from thereafter penalizing the negligent failure of a telegraph company to deliver promptly an interstate telegram in that state.

Submitted December 19, 1919. Decided January 12, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court of Allen County in that state, imposing a penalty upon a telegraph company for failure promptly to deliver an interstate telegram. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, — Ind. —, 115 N. E. 773.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rush Taggart and Francis Raymond Stark submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The states are no longer free to administer their varying local policies with respect either (1) to the validity of the limitations of liability in the contract for the transmission of an interstate telegram, or (2) the elements of damage which are to be recognized apart from such contractual limitations; but, as to both such matters, they are bound, as are interstate carriers of goods and passengers, to recognize and apply the Federal rule.

Mr. Arthur W. Parry submitted the cause for defendant in error:

The Indiana statute applies to interstate messages only where the act of negligence occurs within the state of Indiana, and in the entire absence of partiality or bad faith.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferguson, 157 Ind. 37, 60 N. E. 679; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Braxtan, 165 Ind. 165, 74 N. E. 985; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McClelland, 38 Ind. App. 578, 78 N. E. 672; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Sefrit, 38 Ind. App. 565, 78 N. E. 638.

The state, in the exercise of its police power, has the right to impose penalties upon telegraph companies for the failure to deliver messages promptly within the limits of the state, even where the messages are sent from another state. Statutes like the Indiana statute are a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and affect interstate commerce in only an incidental sense, being an aid to it rather than a burden or regulation upon it, and as such will remain in full force and effect until such time as Congress may pass an act on the same subject in direct and positive conflict with the act of the state.

Co. v. Mellon, 96 Tenn. 66, 33 S. W. 725; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mellon, 100 Tenn. 429, 45 S. W. 443; Vermilye v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 205 Mass. 598, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 472, 91 N. The states have surrendered to the United States the right to regulate interstate commerce, but the states have retained the right, known as the police power, to pass laws for the protection and convenience of their citizens, even though such laws may incidentally affect interstate commerce. The United States, within its sphere, is sovereign; but each state, within its sphere, is equally sovereign. Therefore, a law enacted by Congress within its lawful power will not supersede an act of the state, enacted within its lawful power, unless the act of Congress covers the precise and particular subject-matter covered by the act of the state. It does not invalidate the state statute merely because the two relate to the same general subject.

Where the subject-matter of a statute is not of such a national character as to require uniform regulation or legislation, applicable to all states alike, the power of Congress is not exclusive, and a statute of a state, enacted in pursuance of its police power, will be permitted to stand until Congress sees fit to enter the particular field and actually legislate upon the precise subject-matter embraced by the terms of the state statute.

Pittsburgh C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 180 Ind. 245, L.R.A.1915D, 458, 102 N. E. 25; Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, 42 L. ed. 878, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hughes, 191 U. S. 477, 48 L. ed. 268, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132, affirming 202 Pa. 222, 63 L.R.A. 513, 97 Am. St. Rep. 713, 51 Atl. 990, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 185; Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 137, 47 L. ed. 108, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 92; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Mazursky, 216 U. S. 122, 54 L. ed. 411, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 378; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hartford City, 170 Ind. 674, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461, 82 N. E. 787, 85 N. E. 362; Lasater v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 177 Mo. App. 534, 160 S. W. 818; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ewing, 241 Pa. 581, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 977, 88 Atl. 775, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 157.

Inaction by Congress upon subjects of a local nature or operation, unlike its inaction upon matters affecting all the states, and requiring uniformity of regulation, is not to be taken as a declaration that nothing shall be done with respect to them, but is rather to be deemed a declaration that, until it sees fit to legislate upon the precise subject-matter embraced in the state statute, that subject-matter may be regulated by state authority.

Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 172 Ind. 147, 87 N. E. 1034, 223 U. S. 713, 56 L. ed. 626, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 520; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 698, 26 L. ed. 238, 240; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 688, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289; Varnville Furniture Co. v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 98 S. C. 63, 79 S. E. 700.

A statute enacted in execution of a reserved power of a state is not to be regarded as inconsistent with an act of Congress passed in execution of a clear power under the Constitution, unless the repugnance or conflict is so direct and positive that the two acts cannot be reconciled or stand together.

Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715; Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright, 225 U. S. 540, 56 L. ed. 1197, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784; Asbell v. Kansas, 209 U. S. 251, 52 L. ed. 778, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485, 14 Ann. Cas. 1101; Crossman v. Lurman, 192 U. S. 189, 48 L. ed. 401, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 234; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Arkansas, 219 U. S. 453, 55 L. ed. 290, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275.

The mere delegation to the Interstate Commerce Commission of power to pass regulations for the purpose mentioned in the act does not, of itself, supersede state statutes making regulations on the same subjects, and, until specific action by the Commission or Congress, they will remain in full force.

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co. 211 U. S. 612, 53 L. ed. 352, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214.

The case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bilisoly, 116 Va. 562, 82 S. E. 91, as well as the other cases cited by plaintiff in error, so far as they hold that the mere placing of telegraph companies under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission has deprived the state of power to enforce penalties for negligence in delivering messages, are in direct conflict with, and are therefore in effect overruled by, the United States Supreme Court in the case of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co. supra; and, so far as they hold that the Interstate Commerce Act, by entering the general field of regulation of telegraph companies and providing penalties for intentional discrimination, although admittedly not touching the precise subject of negligence in delivery of messages, has superseded the state statute as to that subject, the cases relied upon by the plaintiff in error are in direct conflict with, and, therefore, in effect are overruled by, the law as determined by the United States Supreme Court in the cases of:

Congress has not, by the amendment of June 18, 1910, to the Interstate Commerce Act, superseded state statutes providing a penalty against telegraph companies for negligence in delaying delivery of messages within the limits of the respective states.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Boegli, — Ind. —, 115 N. E. 773.

And it has also been held in carefully reasoned cases that the amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act have not so occupied the field of regulation of telegraph companies as to render void the statutes of the various states, providing that damages might be recovered for mental anguish caused by negligence in the delivery of telegrams, and the statutes which make void the customary stipulations by which a telegraph company seeks ostensibly to limit, but, in fact, to exempt itself from, its liability for negligence in the delivery of messages, but that such statutes still remain valid.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bailey, 108 Tex. 427, 196 S. W. 516, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 171 S. W. 839,— Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 519; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Piper, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 191 S. W. 817; Dickerson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 114 Miss. 115, 74 So. 779; Warren-Godwin Lumber Co. v. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. 116 Miss. 660, 77 So. 601; Des Arc Oil Mill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 132 Ark. 335, 6 A.L.R. 1081, 201 S. W. 273; Bowman & B. Co. v. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. 290 Ill. 155, 124 N. E. 851.

Although the Interstate Commerce Act regulated railroads in considerable detail, it did not, prior to the Carmack Amendment in 1906, render invalid state statutes either imposing penalties on certain defaults of the railroad or rendering void limitations contained in bills of lading seeking to limit their liability. And the Carmack Amendment had that effect only because it specifically covered that exact subject.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hughes, 191 U. S. 477, 48 L. ed. 268, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Mazursky, 216 U. S. 122, 54 L. ed. 411, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 378; Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 57 L. ed. 314, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl, 227 U. S. 639, 57 L. ed. 683, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391.

But the Carmack Amendment does not apply to telegraph companies.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bailey, 108 Tex. 427, 196 S. W. 516.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The telegraph company challenged the right to subject it to a penalty fixed by a law of Indiana for failure to deliver promptly in that state a telegram sent there from a point in Illinois, on the ground that the Act of Congress of June 18, 1910, amending the Act to Regulate Commerce (36 Stat. at L. 539, 545, chap. 309, Comp. Stat. § 8563) had deprived the state of all power in the premises. The court, conceding that if the act of Congress [316] dealt with the subject, the state statute would be inoperative, imposed the penalty on the ground that the Act of 1910 did not extend to that field. The correctness of this conclusion is the one controversy with which the arguments are concerned.

The proposition that the Act of 1910 must be narrowly construed so as to preserve the reserved power of the state over the subject in hand, although it is admitted that that power is in its nature Federal, and may be exercised by the state only because of nonaction by Congress, is obviously too conflicting and unsound to require further notice. We therefore consider the statute in the light of its text, and, if there be ambiguity, of its context, in order to give effect to the intent of Congress as manifested in its enactment.

As the result of doing so, we are of opinion that the provisions of the statute bringing telegraph companies under the Act to Regulate Commerce, as well as placing them under the administrative control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so clearly establish the purpose of Congress to subject such companies to a uniform national rule as to cause it to be certain that there was no room thereafter for the exercise by the several states of power to regulate, by penalizing the negligent failure to deliver promptly an interstate telegram, and that the court below erred, therefore, in imposing the penalty fixed by the state statute.

We do not pursue the subject further, since the effect of the Act of 1910 in taking possession of the field was recently determined in exact accordance with the conclusion we have just stated. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Warren-Godwin Lumber Co. 251 U. S. 27, ante, 118, 40

Sup. Ct. Rep. 69. That case, indeed, was concerned only with the operation, after the passage of the Act of 1910, of a state statute rendering illegal a clause of a contract for sending an interstate telegram limiting the amount of recovery under the conditions stated in case of an unrepeated message; but the [317] ruling that the effect of the Act of 1910 was to exclude the possibility thereafter of applying the state law was rested, not alone upon the special provisions of the Act of 1910, relating to unrepeated messages, but upon the necessary effect of the general provisions of that act, bringing telegraph companies under the control of the Interstate Commerce Act. The contention as to the continuance of state power here made is therefore adversely foreclosed. Indeed, in the previous case the principal authorities here relied upon to sustain the continued right to exert state power after the passage of the Act of 1910 were disapproved, and various decisions of state courts of last resort to the contrary, one or more dealing with the subject now in hand, were approvingly cited.

Reversed and remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

BIRGE-FORBES COMPANY, Petitioner,
v.
CARL R. HEYE.

War — alien enemies — remedies.

1. The existence of war did not make it improper for a circuit court of appeals to affirm, with a modification that the sum recovered be paid over to the Alien Property Custodian, a money judgment in favor of an alien enemy, recovered in the district court before war was declared, the collection of which was delayed by defendant's act in carrying the case up to the higher court.

[For other cases, see War, V. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Appeal — following decision below — res judicata.

2. The Federal Supreme Court will not ordinarily disturb the decision of the trial court, made after both parties moved for a directed verdict, that a certain issue was determined in a former suit tried by the same judge.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VIII. a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Judgment — res judicata — matters concluded.

3. A judgment for plaintiff in a suit to recover the amounts of certain arbitration awards which he had paid on defendant's account, though limited to sums which plaintiff had then paid, must be regarded as a conclusive adjudication as to the validity of the awards in a second suit to recover the sums paid by plaintiff, not embraced in the first judgment, where, in the first suit, the awards were dealt with as a whole, objections to them being general, and the objections were overruled, the court assuming that the awards were obligatory, but cutting down the amount to be recovered to the sum that had been paid.

[For other cases, see Judgment, III. j, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Deposition — of party.

4. The objection that the deposition of a party could not be taken, if valid at all, is not fairly open where there is no attempt to fish for information, and an agreement was made that "time notice and copy are hereby waived," and that "the officer may proceed to take and return the depositions of the witness on the original direct and cross interrogatories, but commission is not waived."

[For other cases, see Depositions, II. e, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Depositions — return.

5. Depositions of foreign witnesses are not inadmissible because the mode of return did not follow strictly the state statute, in that the officer to whom the commission was directed did not put the depositions into the mail and certify on the envelop that he had done so, where the course was impossible, owing to war, and the officer did transmit the depositions in the only practicable way, giving them to an American consul, and having them transmitted to the Department of State, and then through the mail to the clerk of court,—the integrity of the depositions not being questioned.

[For other cases, see Depositions, III. e, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Limitation of actions — foreign statute.

6. The six months' limitation prescribed by the German Civil Code, § 477, for claims for defect of quality, did not apply where the claims had been submitted to arbitration and passed upon.

Note.—On alien enemies as litigants—see notes to Taylor v. Albion Lumber Co. L.R.A.1918B, 189, and Krachanake v. Acme Mfg. Co. L.R.A.1918E, 809.

On effect of war on agency—see note to New York L. Ins. Co. v. Davis, 24 L. ed. U. S. 453.

On effect of war on contracts with alien enemies—see note to Zinc Corp. v. Hirsch, L.R.A.1917C, 662.

On effect of war on litigation pending at the time of its outbreak—see note to Watts, W. & Co. v. Unione Austriaca di Navigazione, 3 A.L.R. 327.

Evidence — presumptions — value — German mark.

7. In a suit by a German agent against his American principal to recover the amounts of certain arbitration awards which the former had paid on the latter's account, the value of the German mark in which such payments were made will be taken at par, in the absence of evidence that it had depreciated at the time of such payments.

Argued November 13 and 14, 1919. Decided January 12, 1920.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed, with a modification that the sum recovered be paid over to the Alien Property Custodian, a money judgment of the District Court for the Eastern District of Texas in favor of an alien enemy, recovered before the war with Germany was declared. Affirmed.

See same case below, 160 C. C. A. 536, 248 Fed. 636.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry O. Head argued the cause, and, with Mr. Jesse F. Holt, filed a brief for petitioner:

The circuit court of appeals erred in not sustaining plaintiff in error's motion to abate this suit and postpone the consideration thereof until the termination of the present war between the United States and the German Empire.

The court erred in admitting the depositions of Heye and Polletin.

A judgment is res judicata in a second suit only as to matters that were directly presented and decided in the first; and is not res judicata as to matters which might have been decided, but were not in fact passed upon, no matter how conclusive the evidence may have been.

If it be held that the claims of the parties in whose favor the original awards were rendered were barred both as to the principal and the surety when defendant in error made the payment, was the circuit court of appeals correct in holding that defendant in error was not required to take advantage of the statute, but could make the payments and compel plaintiff in error to reimburse him?

In view of the agreements or waivers signed by counsel for the Birge-Forbes Company, under which the depositions of Heye and Polletin were taken, and in view of the fact that the company, by its attorneys, propounded cross interrogatories to these witnesses without reserving any objections, and in view of the further fact that the manner of taking and returning these depositions was substantially regular, and wholly free from any suspicion of unfairness, the trial court properly refused to suppress the depositions, and properly allowed them to be used as evidence, and the circuit court of appeals committed no error in sustaining such action of the trial court.

The judgment of May 23, 1913, fully established the validity of the Bremen awards as a whole, the undisputed amount of which awards was 312,749.30 German marks, the equivalent of which in American money was about $74,820.52. In the trial of the first case between Heye and the Birge-Forbes Company, which went to judgment May 23, 1913, all the arbitration awards for the cotton season of 1910–1911 were involved together, were in exactly the same category, had exactly the same status, were subjected to exactly the same attacks, and under the issues made were necessarily required to stand as a whole or fall as a whole. They stood as a whole, and the only reason for not then rendering judgment for the full amount of all the awards and interest thereon was that the suit was premature to the extent of the amount not actually paid by Heye at that time on the awards, he being held to be a surety or guarantor for the Birge-Forbes Company, and his cause of action not ripe until actual payment by him. Therefore, it being shown by the undisputed evidence that he had made partial payments, aggregating $36,610.90, he was given judgment for that amount (plus a small sum for other items not of interest here), and was denied a recovery for the rest until he should pay the rest.

The court was well warranted in finding that the reclamation claims, which, when established by arbitration at Bremen, Heye became liable for as guarantor, and afterwards paid, were not barred by limitation at the time he paid them; and, moreover, such finding involved a matter of fact not reviewable on writ of error.

Inasmuch as the court could take judicial notice of the value of a German mark, expressed in terms of American money, and inasmuch as the evidence on the trial showed without substantial dispute that such value was 23.8 cents, the court properly took such value as the basis for determining the amount of the verdict to be directed. Furthermore, defendant, by moving the court for a directed verdict in its favor, waived and surrendered any right to claim that there were issues that should go to the jury.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by Heye, a cotton broker in Bremen, against the petitioner, cotton exporter in Texas, to recover sums that Heye had to pay on its account. The payments were made upon cotton sold by Heye as the petitioner's agent, to different buyers, for alleged failure of the cotton to correspond to the description upon which the price was based. In pursuance of the contracts and the rules of the Bremen Cotton Exchange the claims of the buyers were submitted to arbitration, which resulted in awards against the plaintiff for a total of 312,749.30 German marks, alleged to be equal to about $74,820.52. Before the present suit was brought another one had been carried to judgment in the same district, in which that amount was claimed. At that time Heye had paid only $36,610.96 of the awards. The judge directed a verdict for the sum that the plaintiff had paid and another item not now in issue. Heye now has paid the whole, and brings this suit to recover the amount of the later payment not embraced in the former judgment. He prevailed in the district court, and the judgment was affirmed with a modification as to payment by the circuit court of appeals. 160 C. C. A. 536, 248 Fed. 636. The main question on the merits is whether the former judgment was conclusive as to the validity of the awards, but that upon which the certiorari was granted was a preliminary one, as is shown by the fact that certiorari was denied in the former suit. 234 U. S. 759, 58 L. ed. 1580, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676. After the case had been [323] taken to the circuit court of appeals a motion was made to dismiss or suspend the suit on the ground that Heye had become an alien enemy by reason of the declaration of war between Germany and the United States. The circuit court of appeals, however, affirmed the judgment with the modification that it should be paid to the clerk of the trial court and by him turned over to the Alien Property Custodian, with further details not material here.

Upon the last-mentioned question, although it seemed proper that it should be set at rest, we can feel no doubt. The plaintiff had got his judgment before war was declared, and the defendant, the petitioner, had delayed the collection of it by taking the case up. Such a case was disposed of without discussion by Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court in Owens v. Hanney, 9 Cranch, 180, 3 L. ed. 697; Kershaw v. Kelsey, 100 Mass. 561, 564, 97 Am. Dec. 124, 1 Am. Rep. 142. There is nothing "mysteriously noxious" (Coolidge v. Inglee, 13 Mass. 26, 37) in a judgment for an alien enemy. Objection to it in these days goes only so far as it would give aid and comfort to the other side. Hanger v. Abbott, 6 Wall. 532, 536, 18 L. ed. 939, 941; M'Connell v. Hector, 3 Bos. & P. 113, 114, 127 Eng. Reprint, 61, 6 Revised Rep. 724. Such aid and comfort were prevented by the provision that the sum recovered should be paid over to the Alien Property Custodian, and the judgment in this respect was correct. When the alien enemy is defendant, justice to him may require the suspension of the case. Watts, W. & Co. v. Unione Austriaca di Navigazione, 248 U. S. 9, 22, 63 L. ed. 100, 101, 3 A.L.R. 323, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

On the merits the first question is whether the former judgment was conclusive as to the validity of the awards, assuming them to have been identified as the same that were sued upon in the former case. Taking merely the former declaration and judgment, it could not be said with certainty that some of the awards might not have been held invalid, and that the defendant h .d not satisfied the [324] whole obligation found to exist. But we have before us the fact that the court directed a verdict and the charge. From the latter, as also from the answer, apart from a general denial, it appears that the awards were dealt with as a whole, and that the objections to them were general. The objections were overruled, and the court assumed that the awards were obligatory, but cut down the amount to be recovered to the sum that had been paid. The case went to the circuit court of appeals, and the same things appear in the report of the case there. 128 C. C. A. 628, 212 Fed. 112. Certiorari denied in 234 U. S. 759, 58 L. ed. 1580, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676. In the present case both parties moved the court to direct a verdict. Beuttell v. Magone, 157 U. S. 154, 157, 39 L. ed. 654, 655, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566; Empire State Cattle Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 210 U. S. 1, 8, 52 L. ed. 931, 936, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 607, 15 Ann. Cas. 70. Taking that and the fact that the same judge seems to have presided in both suits into account, we should be slow to disturb his decision that the issue was determined in the former one if we felt more doubt than we do. But we are satisfied the decision of the two courts below was right.

We shall deal summarily with two or three highly technical arguments urged against the affirmation of the judgment. One is that the depositions of Heye and a witness were not returned, as required by the Texas statute providing for taking them, with a suggestion that, as Heye was a party, his deposition could not be taken at all. As to the latter point it is to be noticed that it did not present an attempt to fish for information from the opposite party, and that an agreement was made that "time notice and copy are hereby waived," and that "the officer may proceed to take and return the depositions of the witness on the original direct and cross interrogatories, but commission is not waived." Whatever may be the general rule (as to which see Blood v. Morrin, 140 Fed. 918), we think that this objection is not fairly open. As to the mode of return not having followed strictly the Texas [325] statute, because the officer to whom the commission was directed did not put the depositions into the mail and certify on the envelops that he had done so, a sufficient answer is that that course was impossible, owing to the war, and that the officer did transmit the depositions in the only practicable way. He gave them to an American consul and had them transmitted to the Department of State, and then through the mail to the clerk. The integrity of the depositions is not questioned, the statute was complied with in substance, and justice is not to be defeated now by a matter of the barest form.

We see no error in the finding that § 477 of the German Civil Code did not bar the claim. Assuming the question to be open, the court was warranted in finding that a six months' limitation to claims for defect of quality did not apply where the claims had been submitted to arbitration and passed upon. The same is true with regard to the taking the value of the German mark at par in the absence of evidence that it had depreciated at the time of the plaintiff's payments. On the whole case our conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — weighing.

Railway companies carrying the mails after the Postmaster General had, by a readjustment order, directed that compensation be based upon a calculation of average weight, made by taking the whole number of days included in the weighing period as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day, instead of the number of working or week days, as was the former practice, are bound by such order, either because the Postmaster General had the discretionary power to make the order, as is held by four justices, or because, as is held by two justices, the railway companies by their conduct in fact accepted the terms offered by the Postmaster General by transporting the mails and accepting the stated compensation.

Argued December 17, 18, and 19, 1919. Decided January 12, 1920.

FOUR APPEALS from the Court of Claims to review judgments rejecting claims for increased compensation for carrying the mails. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 258.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander Britton argued the cause, and, with Messrs. C. W. Bunn and Evans Browne, filed a brief for appellant in No. 109.

Messrs. Abram R. Serven and Burt E. Barlow filed a brief as amici curiæ on behalf of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company.

Mr. Benjamin Carter argued the cause, and, with Mr. James F. Wright, filed a brief for appellant in No. 132.

Mr. L. T. Michener filed a brief as amicus curiæ for the Minneapolis, St. Paul, & Sault Sainte Marie Railway Company.

Mr. R. Stuart Knapp filed a brief in behalf of the Bellefonte Central Railroad Company.

Mr. Frederic D. McKenney argued the cause, and, with Mr. John Spalding Flannery, filed a brief for appellant in No. 133.

Mr. F. Carter Pope argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant in No. 232.

Solicitor General King and Mr. La Rue Brown argued the cause, and, with Mr. Joseph Stewart, filed a brief for the United States.

Solicitor General King, Messrs. Frank Davis, Jr., and J. Robert Anderson also filed a brief for the United States.

Mr. Justice Holmes announced the judgment of the court, and delivered the following opinion, concurred in by the CHIEF JUSTICE and Justices Brandeis and Clarke:

These are claims for compensation for carrying the mails above the amounts allowed and paid by the Postmaster General. The four cases are independent of one another, [329] but as the claims all depend for their validity upon a denial of the Postmaster General's power to pass a certain order, they may be considered together. They were rejected by the court of claims. The question, shortly stated, is this: The pay for carrying the mails is determined by the average weight carried. To ascertain this average the mails are weighed for a certain number of consecutive days, and for some time before 1907 the total weight was divided by the number of working days: if the number of days was thirty-five, it was divided by thirty; if one hundred and five, by ninety. But on June 7, 1907, the Postmaster General issued an order, No. 412, "that when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day." This, of course, diminishes the average weight, and therefore the pay of the railroads. They deny the authority of the Postmaster General to make the change, and sue for the additional sum that, under the old practice, they would have received.

The texts to be discussed begin with an Act of 1873, but it should be observed, as furnishing a background for that and the following statutes, that from the beginning of the government the Postmaster General, as the head of a great business enterprise, always has been intrusted, as he must be, with a wide discretion concerning what contracts he should make, with whom, and upon what terms. It is needless to go into the early statutes, or to do more than to refer to Rev. Stat. § 3999, Comp. Stat. § 7478, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 189, which authorizes him to make other arrangements if he cannot contract for the carriage of the mail upon a railway route at a compensation not exceeding the maximum rates then established, or for what he deems reasonable and fair. The limitations upon the power were in the interest of the business, the principal one being that the pay per mile per annum should not exceed certain rates. Act of June 8, 1872, chap. 335, § 211, 17 [330] Stat. at L. 283, 309, Comp. Stat. § 567, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 250, Rev. Stat. §§ 3998, 4002, Comp. Stat. § 7483, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 195. The language plainly showed and the decisions have established that the Postmaster General, if it seemed to him reasonable, could refuse to pay the maximum and insist upon some lesser rate as a condition of dealing with a road. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 649, 56 L. ed. 1236, 1239, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702.

The Act of March 3, 1873, chap. 231, 17 Stat. at L. 556, 558, Comp. Stat. § 7483, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 195, appropriates $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, "for increase of compensation for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the condition and at the rates hereinafter mentioned." Then, after providing for due frequency and speed and suitable accommodations for route agents,—matters on which obviously the Postmaster General is the person to be satisfied,—it enacts that "the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of two hundred pounds, fifty dollars; five hundred pounds, seventy-five dollars," etc., etc. So far it will be seen that, although the object is to permit an increase of compensation, still the discretion of the Postmaster General under the earlier acts remains, and that he could decline to pay the maximum rates, however ascertained, or any sum greater than he should deem reasonable. It is argued, to be sure, that the rates were fixed at the maximum, and the Act of July 12, 1876, chap. 179, 19 Stat. at L. 78, 79, Comp. Stat. § 7484, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 198, reducing the compensation "ten per centum per annum from the rates fixed and allowed," is thought to help the conclusion. But no argument can obscure the meaning of the words "shall not exceed." The rates were fixed and reduced in their maxima, but that was all that was done with regard to them. United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 249 U. S. 451, 454, 63 L. ed. 703, 704, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 325. The question is whether, for any reason, the control over the compensation thus undeniably given to him [331] without imposing any downward limit as to the money rates is wholly withdrawn from his judgment in the preliminary stage of determining the basis to which the money rates are to be applied.

The next words of the statute are: "The average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times," etc., "and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct." The pay, it will be remembered, was to be per mile per annum, and as it was not practicable to weigh all the mails throughout the year and so to find out the total actual weight of the mails and the exact number of miles that they were carried in the year, the result had to be arrived at approximately by finding the average weight carried on days assumed to resemble the other days of the 365. The average to be reached was not an average for the thirty days, but an average weight per day for the year. This interpretation is shown to be the understanding of Congress by the Act of July 12, 1876, chap. 179, 19 Stat. at L. 78, 79, Comp. Stat. § 7484, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 198, which reduces the compensation 10 per centum per annum from the rates fixed and allowed by the Act of 1873 "for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight." This must mean the average weight for the year concerned. Again, by the Act of March 3, 1905, chap. 1480, 33 Stat. at L. 1082, 1088, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 204, "the average weight [i. e., of course, the average weight for the year] shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than ninety," etc., the increase in the number of days manifestly being for the purpose of more nearly hitting the average for the whole time. The statutes do not mention the divisor to be used in order to get the average desired. In 1873 mails were not carried on Sundays except over a comparatively small proportion of routes, and therefore six was the fairest single divisor. [332] Now, on the other hand, it is said that the mileage of the seven-day routes is much greater than that of the six days. Therefore now to weigh for Sundays as well as other days, and to divide by seven, is the fairest single rule that can be found.

But it is said that when an average is directed to be reached by weighing for, say, thirty working days, it is implied that you are to get the average by using the number of working days on which the mails were weighed as a divisor, that working days mean week days, and that if in fact Sundays are used as working days, the divisor is not affected because the statute only contemplated six for a week. But the supposed implication of the statute disappears when it is remembered that the average wanted is not the average for the weighing days only, but the average for the year. It is plain, too, that, whether "working days" be read to mean week days or the days on which work was done in fact, the statute contemplates the working days and the weighing days as identical, and therefore affords no ground for demanding the advantage of a dividend of seven and a divisor of six, which is what the railroads want.

Various makeweights are thrown in to help the construction desired by the roads, but they seem to us insufficient to change the result that is reached by reading the words. It is said that down to 1907 the Postoffice Department construed the Acts of 1873 and after as entitling the railroads to the maximum rates for full service as defined, and to the minimum divisors, and that this construction must be taken to have been adopted in silence, by the later statutes. But the exercise of power in the way deemed just while the conditions stated to have existed in and after 1873 continued was not a construction, but the exercise of discretion in determining the amount of pay,—a discretion which, as we have seen, undeniably was given in the form of a right to regulate [333] rates, and which therefore there could be no reason for withholding, beyond the express words of the act, at the other end. It is true that in 1884 an Assistant Attorney General gave an opinion that any departure from the practice would defeat the intention of the law and cause no little embarrassment, and that thereafter an order made by a previous Postmaster for taking the number of weighing days as the divisor was revoked. But the letter of the Postmaster General thus answered merely stated what had been the practice as to the divisor, and asked whether it was in violation of law. It did not state that the Postoffice considered itself bound to follow that way. The order that was revoked only purported to affect seven-day routes, and is of little or no importance to the question before us now.

It is said that the rate was fixed by the Act of March 2, 1907, chap. 2513, 34 Stat. at L. 1205, 1212, Comp. Stat. § 7487, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 205, if not before, by a reduction to "five per centum less than the present rates" on certain routes. But as we have stated, we understand this to mean a reduction of the rates fixed by statute,—that is, the maximum rates. We do not understand it to refer to rates specifically allowed. It is not likely that Congress considered the latter in detail.

Finally, much is made of the fact that before the passage of the Act of March 3, 1905, and again before the passage of the Act of March 2, 1907, provisos were stricken out that in effect required the divisor to be the number of the weighing days. A similar thing happened before the passage of the act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. We do not go into the particulars of these matters, because whatever may have been said by individuals, the provisos might as well have been rejected for the purpose of leaving the choice between the two divisors to the judgment of the Postmaster General as for any other reason. On the other hand, we are not disposed to lay much stress on the fact [334] that the appropriations by Congress accepted the Postmaster General's estimates even when it had been notified that the railroads were dissatisfied with Order No. 412. The Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 128, 18 Stat. at L. 340, 341, Comp. Stat. §§ 7221, 7489, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 52, 197, ordered the Postmaster General to have the weighing done thereafter by the employees of the Postoffice Department, and to "have the weights stated and verified to him by said employees under such instructions as he may consider just to the Postoffice Department and the railroad companies." Possibly this might be construed to recognize the power now in dispute, but this suggestion also we are content to leave on one side. We also leave unconsidered the great difficulties that the railroads encounter in the effort to show that their conduct did not amount to an acceptance of the Postmaster General's terms within the decision in New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. United States, Dec. 8, 1919, 251 U. S. 123, ante, 182, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67. The construction of the statutes disposes of all the cases without the need of going into further details.

Judgments affirmed.

Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice VanDevanter dissent. Mr. Justice McReynolds took no part in the decision of the cases.

Mr. Justice Pitney, with whom concurred Mr. Justice McKenna:

I concur in the affirmance of the judgments of the court of claims in these cases, but upon grounds somewhat different from those expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes.

All the claims arose under the law as it stood after the Act of March 2, 1907, chap. 2513, 34 Stat. at L. 1205, 1212, and before that of July 28, 1916, chap. 261, 39 Stat. at L. 412, 429, by which the carriage of mail matter by the railways was made compulsory. The act about which the principal [335] controversy turns is that of March 3, 1873, chap. 231, 17 Stat. at L. 556, 558, the disputed portion of which was carried into § 4002, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. § 7483, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 195. By it the Postmaster General was "authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned: . . . Second, That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of two hundred pounds, fifty dollars; . . . five thousand pounds, two hundred dollars, and twenty-five dollars additional for every additional two thousand pounds, the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times . . . and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may direct."

In my opinion, the rates of pay per mile per annum were maximum rates, and the Postmaster General had a discretion to contract at less if the railroads agreed; but under § 210 of the Act of June 8, 1872, chap. 335, 17 Stat. at L. 283, 309, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3997, he was under a duty to arrange the routes into classes according to the size of the mail, and the speed, frequency, and importance of the service, "so that each railway company shall receive, as far as practicable, a proportionate and just rate of compensation, according to the service performed."

But I think that in the clause "the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty," etc., the words "successive working days," by proper interpretation, mean successive week days; and since the aggregate weight for the weighing period must be subjected to division in order to ascertain the [336] average weight per day, it naturally follows that the divisor should be the same number of "working days" (that is, week days) that are included in the period. The previous history of the mail service shows abundant reason for this, and for more than thirty years thereafter the provision was uniformly so construed by the Department. Upon a large number of the railway routes, mails were carried six days each week, none being carried on Sunday; while on other routes they were carried on every day in the week. The aggregate weight of mails carried was not affected by the frequency of the service, since the six-day routes carried the Sunday accumulations on Mondays. This explains why a certain number of "working days" (week days) was made the measure of the weighing period, and at the same time shows that the week-day divisor was necessary in order to deal equitably with both the six-day and the seven-day routes. From the passage of the Act of 1873 down to the promulgation of Order No. 412 in the year 1907, the practice of the Department was in accord with the above interpretation. It was explained in a communication from the Postmaster General to the Senate January 21, 1885, Senate Ex. Doc. No. 40, 48th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 68: "The present rule is, on those roads carrying the mails six times a week, to weigh the mails on thirty consecutive days on which the mails are carried, which would cover a period of thirty-five days; dividing the aggregate thirty weighings by thirty will give the daily average. On those roads carrying the mails seven times per week the weighing is done for thirty-five consecutive days (including Sundays) and the aggregate divided by thirty for a basis of pay. It is evident that the period during which the weighing is continued covers, in both cases, all the mails carried for thirty-five days. If, in the second case, we should take our basis from an average obtained by dividing the aggregate weight by thirty-five, we should commit the absurdity of putting a [337] premium upon inefficiency; for evidently if the Sunday train were cut off, we should virtually have the same mails less frequently carried, and therefore with a higher daily average, and therefore a higher pay basis than in the case where the seventh train was run and the greater accommodation rendered. The present method gives no additional pay for the additional seventh train, but the other method would cause a reduction on account of better service, and practically would operate as a fine on all those roads carrying the mails daily, including Sunday."

The Act of March 3, 1905, chap. 1480, 33 Stat. at L. 1082, 1088, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 204, changed the minimum weighing period so as to require the inclusion of at least ninety, instead of thirty, successive working days, but made no other change. Under this act one hundred and five calendar days necessarily were included in the weighing period in order to take in ninety successive working days. In my opinion, this act, like that of 1873, by fair construction, required that the week-day divisor be employed. And so it was officially construed until 1907.

But while I regard this method of determining the average weight to have been prescribed, and not left to the discretion of the Postmaster General, still I think the statute in this respect was only directory, and not mandatory. Considering the provision in its relation to the context and subject-matter, it will be seen to be but an aid to the making of fair contracts within the maximum rates allowed, and an aid to the Postmaster General in fixing the rate of compensation upon land-grant routes, and in so arranging routes that each railway company shall receive a proportionate and just rate of compensation according to the service performed. Hence, it seems to me that a failure strictly to comply with the prescribed method of ascertaining the average weight did not of itself render the action of the Postmaster General ultra vires and void.

[338] The principal controversy in the present cases is over his Order No. 412 (June 7, 1907), which provided "that when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day." While I regard it as embodying an erroneous view of the statute, this is not sufficient, in my opinion, to vitiate a contract voluntarily made by a railway mail carrier, based upon a calculation of average weight made and known to have been made in conformity with the order. All the present claims originated after the promulgation of the order, and arose out of the carriage of mails under arrangements made with the Postmaster General after express notice of its provisions.

It is contended that although the Act of 1873 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4002, Comp. Stat. § 7483, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 195), in providing that the pay per mile per annum should "not exceed" the specified rates, conferred upon the Postmaster General a discretion to pay less rates, this was modified by the language of the Act of July 12, 1876, chap. 179, 19 Stat. at L. 78, 79, Comp. Stat. § 7484, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 198, which reduced the compensation 10 per centum from "the rates fixed and allowed . . . [by the Act of 1873] for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight;" by that of the Act of June 17, 1878, chap. 259, 20 Stat. at L. 140, 142, Comp. Stat. §§ 7548, 7486, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 226, 199), where, however, the expression is: "By reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails five per centum per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails, on the basis of the average weight fixed and allowed," etc.; or by the provision of the Act of March 2, 1907, chap. 2513, 34 Stat. at L. 1205, 1212, Comp. Stat. § 7487, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 205, readjusting compensation on railroad routes carrying an average weight per day exceeding 5,000 pounds, "by making the following changes in the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mail on such routes, and hereafter the rates on such routes shall be as follows," etc. I am not convinced that these amendments, or any of them, had [339] the effect of impliedly repealing that part of the Act of 1873 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4002), "shall not exceed," etc., from which alone, in my view, the Postmaster General derived any serviceable discretion about readjusting the compensation.

Therefore, he still had liberty of action within the maximum rates prescribed. And the railroad companies, other than such as had been aided by grants of lands or otherwise, were free to carry the mails at rates offered, or refuse them, as they chose. Eastern R. Co. v. United States, 129 U. S. 391, 396, 32 L. ed. 730, 732, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 320; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 650, 56 L. ed. 1236, 1239, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. United States, 249 U. S. 385, 388, 63 L. ed. 659, 661, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 348; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. United States, Dec. 8, 1919, 251 U. S. 123, ante, 182, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67.

Furthermore, by § 212 of the Act of June 8, 1872, chap. 335, 17 Stat. at L. 283, 309, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3999, Comp. Stat. § 7478, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 189, if, because of the refusal of the railway companies, the Postmaster General was unable to make contracts at a compensation "not exceeding the maximum rates," or for what he deemed a reasonable and fair compensation, he was at liberty to use other means of carriage.

From the findings of the court of claims it appears that in all of these cases there were express contracts; and I concur in the view of that court (53 Ct. Cl. 258, 308, 315, 318, 319) that the contracts arose not out of the Distance Circular in which the Postmaster General specially called notice to Order No. 412, and to which some of the claimants responded with protests, more or less explicit, that they would not be bound by that order; but arose out of what subsequently happened. The Postmaster General in every case informed the protesting carriers that he would not enter into contract with any railroad company excepting it from the operation of any postal law or regulation. The mails were weighed and the average weight ascertained in accordance with Order No. 412, [340] as all the claimants had been notified would be done; thereafter the Postmaster General, upon the basis of the weight thus ascertained, caused the maximum statutory rate to be calculated, issued orders naming certain amounts thus arrived at as the compensation for the service, and gave notice in proper form to the carriers, specifying in terms the readjusted pay that would be allowed, "subject to future orders and to fines and deductions." Thereafter the carriers received and transported the mails as offered, periodically accepted compensation in accordance with the readjustment notices, and proceeded thus without further objection or protest until the end of the respective quadrennial periods. In short, although in some cases they declared they would not consent to the ascertainment of average weights on the basis of Order No. 412, they did not insist upon their objection in the face of the Postmaster General's declaration that he would not accede to it. Had they refused to carry the mails on the terms proposed, he might have exercised his discretion as to the rate of pay per mile, so that instead of agreeing to give them, as he did, the maximum pay based on the average weight ascertained under Order No. 412, he might have acceded to their contention by employing the week-day divisor, but have carried into effect his own view as to the amount that ought to be allowed by reducing the rate of pay per mile. Or, as already shown, he might have refused to make the contracts and have proceeded under § 3999.

I deem it clear, therefore, that the claimants in fact accepted the Postmaster General's offers as contained in the readjustment notices, by proceeding to perform the prescribed service in accordance therewith and accepting the compensation due to them therefor. And so the court of claims held (53 Ct. Cl. 258, 308, 313, 315, 318, 319).

Some of the routes of the Seaboard Air Line and of the Northern Pacific Railway Company were over lines that had been aided by government land grants, and hence [341] were subject to provisions of law summed up in § 214 of the Act of June 8, 1872 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4001, Comp. Stat. § 7482, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 194), by which they were obliged to "carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and, until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General may fix the rate of compensation." The Seaboard Air Line makes no point of this; but in behalf of the Northern Pacific it is contended that claimant, not being in the position of a free agent, ought not to be regarded as having voluntarily accepted the terms proposed by the Postmaster General. But the effect of the findings is that it did so accept; and this result cannot be overturned by raising an argument about the circumstances that went to make up the evidence upon which the findings were based; and the present contention amounts to no more than this.

Were it otherwise, nevertheless it appears that Congress had not provided the compensation for the land-grant routes, except that it had authorized and directed the Postmaster General to readjust all railway mail pay in the manner set forth in § 4002 and within the maxima prescribed therein and in the amendatory Acts of 1876, 1878, and 1907, above mentioned, and had provided by § 13 of the Act of July 12, 1876; chap. 179, 19 Stat. at L. 78, 82, "that railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only eighty per centum of the compensation authorized by this act," besides other legislation concerning the land-grant routes that may be referred to, but need not be recited (Acts of March 2, 1907, chap. 2513, 34 Stat. at L. 1205, 1212; May 12, 1910, chap. 230, 36 Stat. at L. 355, 362; July 28, 1916, chap. 261, 39 Stat. at L. 412, 426). Assuming, therefore, that there was no contract affecting the land-grant lines of the Northern Pacific, their compensation must be at the rate fixed by the Postmaster General in the exercise [342] of the power and discretion conferred upon him by this legislation; and so long as he exercised this power and discretion reasonably, not fixing a noncompensatory rate or otherwise acting arbitrarily, the carrier was concluded by his action. There is no finding that he acted arbitrarily; on the contrary, he had, in support of Order 412, a considered opinion of the Attorney General under date September 27, 1907 (26 Ops. Atty. Gen. 390); and, so far as appears, he treated the land-grant routes like others, not reducing them below the 80 per centum contemplated by § 13 of the Act of 1876, or otherwise violating the statutes. There is no finding nor any contention that the amounts allowed them were not compensatory; and, upon the whole, it seems to me that although he erred in failing to apply the week-day divisor to the weighings, this did not render the readjustment based thereon wholly void, or permit the carrier, after transporting the mails and accepting the stated compensation without further objection, afterwards to treat the readjustment orders as nullities.

Mr. Justice McKenna concurs in this opinion.

MARYLAND CASUALTY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 342–355.)

Internal revenue — corporation excise tax — income tax — income received or accrued.

1. With respect to domestic corporations no change was intended by the use in the Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913, of the expression income "arising or accruing" instead of income "received," as used in the Corporation Excise Tax Act of August 5, 1909, and the tax should be levied under both acts upon the income "received" during the year.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1918 Supp.]

Internal revenue — corporation excise tax — income tax — insurance companies — gross income.

2. Insurance premiums collected by the local agents of an insurance company, but which, conformably to the agency contracts, were not transmitted to the company's treasurer within the calendar year, were nevertheless a part of the gross income of the company received by it during such year within the meaning of the Corporation Excise Tax Act of August 5, 1909, and the Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1918 Supp.]

Internal revenue — corporation excise tax — income tax — insurance companies — deductions — loss claims reserve.

3. An insurance company's "loss claims reserve," intended to provide for liquidation of claims for unsettled losses (other than those provided for by the reserve for liability losses) which had accrued at the end of the tax year for which the return was made and the reserve computed, is one required by law to be maintained, within the meaning of the provision in both the Corporation Excise Tax Law of August 5, 1909, and the Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913, that "the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds," may be deducted from gross, in determining the amount of net, income to be taxed, where a state insurance department, pursuant to statute, has, at all times since and including 1909, required the company to keep on hand, as a condition of doing business in that state "assets as reserves sufficient to cover outstanding losses."

Internal revenue — corporation excise tax — income tax — insurance companies — deductions — reserves required by state insurance departments.

4. An insurance company's reserves required by rules or regulations of state insurance departments, promulgated in the exercise of an appropriate power conferred by statute, are "required by law," within the meaning of the provision in both the Corporation Excise Tax Act of August 5, 1909, and the Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913, that "the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds," may be deducted from gross, in determining the amount of net, income to be taxed.

Internal revenue — corporation excise tax — income tax — insurance companies — deductions — reserves or assets.

5. Unpaid taxes, salaries, brokerage, and reinsurance due other companies at the end of each tax year may not be deducted from the gross income of an insurance company, under the provision either in the Corporation Excise Tax Act of August 5, 1909, or the Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913, that "the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds," may be deducted from gross, in determining the amount of net, income to be taxed, although various state insurance departments require that "assets as reserves" be maintained to cover "all claims," "all indebtedness," "all outstanding liabilities," where these departments in these expressions plainly used the word "reserves" in a nontechnical sense as equivalent to "assets."

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1918 Supp.]

Insurance — what are reserves.

6. The term "reserve" or "reserves" in the law of insurance means in general a sum of money variously computed or estimated, which, with accretions from interest, is set aside, "reserved," as a fund with which to mature or liquidate either by payment or reinsurance with other companies, future unaccrued and contingent claims, and claims accrued but contingent and indefinite as to amount or time of payment.

Internal revenue — corporation excise tax — income tax — insurance companies — gross income — released reserves.

7. A decrease in the amount of reserves required by law of an insurance company for the year 1913 from the amount required in 1912, unless clearly shown to be due to excessive reserves in prior years, or to some other cause by which the free assets of the company were increased during the year 1913, cannot be treated by the government as "released reserve" and charged to the company as income for 1913, taxable under the Corporation Excise Tax Act of August 5, 1909, and the Income Tax Act of October 3, 1913.

Internal revenue — suit to recover back excessive tax — appeal to Commissioner — limitation.

8. The right to recover back excessive corporation excise tax payments is barred where the corporation failed to appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as required by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3226, and also failed to observe the requirement of § 3227, that suit be begun within two years after the cause of action accrued.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, VII.; Limitation of Actions, III. h, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Internal revenue — suit to recover back excessive tax — appeal to Commissioner — limitation — amended return.

9. The filing by the government of amended returns for the assessment of an insurance company under the Corporation Excise Tax Act of August 5, 1909, cannot be said to constitute the beginning of new proceedings which so superseded the original returns as to release the company from its entire failure to observe the statutory requirement for review of the latter, where in each case the purpose and effect of such amended returns was to increase the payment which the company was required to make under the law, though in dealing with the same items the basis of computation was in some cases varied, and where the payments made on the original returns were credited on the amounts computed as due on the returns as amended.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, VII.; Limitation of Actions, III. h, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 13, 1919. Decided January 12, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment allowing a recovery of a part of certain corporation excise and income taxes alleged to have been unlawfully collected. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

See same case below, 52 Ct. Cl. 201, 288, 53 Ct. Cl. 81.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Burt E. Barlow argued the cause, and, with Mr. Abram R. Serven, filed a brief for appellant:

Income, in its ordinary sense, means that which comes in or is received, and necessarily means cash or its equivalent.

Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Herold, 198 Fed. 214; United States v. Schillinger, 14 Blatchf. 71, Fed. Cas. No. 16,228; Re Murphy, 80 App. Div. 238, 80 N. Y. Supp. 533; 22 Cyc. 66.

All words used in statutes are modified by and vary according to the circumstances and time of use.

Under the Act of 1909 only income received during the taxable year should be included in the income of the corporation for the taxable year.

Hays v. Gauley Mountain Coal Co. 247 U. S. 189–191, 62 L. ed. 1061–1063, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470.

The term "income" has no broader meaning in the 1913 act than in that of 1909.

Southern P. Co. v. Lowe, 247 U. S. 330, 62 L. ed. 1142, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540.

The relation between appellant and its agents is determined by the contract existing between it and its agents. The agent has no greater authority or larger powers than are provided in the contract of agency.

Parsons v. Armor, 3 Pet. 413, 7 L. ed. 724.

Payment to agent, as between principal and agent, is not receipt of payment by the principal.

Money in the hands of an agent for remittance to his principal is not subject to attachment, because it is not strictly the money of the principal until paid over by the agent to the principal.

Maxwell v. McGee, 12 Cush. 137.

The action of trover does not ordinarily lie in favor of a principal against an agent.

The legislature must be presumed to have intended to use language in its ordinary meaning, unless it would manifestly defeat the object of the provision.

Minor v. Mechanics Bank, 1 Pet. 46, 7 L. ed. 47.

The statute should be read according to the natural and obvious import of its language, without resorting to subtle and forced construction. For the purpose of either limiting or extending its operation, and when the language is plain, words or phrases should not be inserted so as to incorporate in the statute a new and distinct provision.

United States v. Temple, 105 U. S. 97, 26 L. ed. 967; United States v. Graham, 110 U. S. 219, 28 L. ed. 126, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582; United States v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169–180, 30 L. ed. 627–631, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; United States v. Lynch, 137 U. S. 280–285, 34 L. ed. 700–702, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114; Houghton v. Payne, 194 U. S. 88–100, 48 L. ed. 888–891, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590.

The term "reserve funds" should mean any fund held in reserve, as is the commonly accepted meaning of the term "reserve."

Dawson Life Ins. p. 183; Webster's Int. Dict. "Reserve;" Century, Dict. "Reserve."

Appellant was legally required to maintain reserves equal to its outstanding liabilities as a condition of its doing business in the state of New York. Further, in case appellant did not maintain such reserves, its license to continue business in the state of New York could be by the superintendent of insurance revoked, or, at the beginning of any year, the superintendent could refuse to issue it.

The power of the superintendent of insurance, under the New York statutes, to exercise his discretion in declining to issue a certificate of authority to transact business in the state of New York, has been decided affirmatively by the New York courts.

People ex rel. Hartford Life & A. Ins. Co. v. Fairman, 91 N. Y. 385, 12 Abb. N. C. 259; People ex rel. Equitable F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Fairman, 12 Abb. N. C. 269; Stern v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 169 App. Div. 217, 154 N. Y. Supp. 472, 217 N. Y. 626, 111 N. E. 1101.

Inasmuch as the state courts of New York have decided that the New York legislature did not exceed its powers in authorizing the superintendent of insurance to exercise his discretion in granting insurance companies licenses to transact business in New York, such question is not an open one in this court, and this court will follow the decision of the New York court.

Dreyer v. Illinois, 187 U. S. 71–84, 47 L. ed. 79–85, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 253.

When appellant maintained its reserves by order of the insurance superintendent, it was by law required to do so, and in determining what were its net additions to reserve funds, appellant was by law required to include in its computation for any year all reserve funds which it was required to maintain by the superintendent of insurance.

In reporting the amount of premiums each year, appellant reported the amount of premiums written, and then deducted what it claimed was the amount uncollected at the end of the year. But it included in the deduction premiums collected but not reported by its agents, the amount of which does not appear. There are, therefore, no facts in the record upon which a judgment for any amount could rest.

Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Herold, 198 Fed. 199; Crookston Bros. v. Furtado, 5 Great Britain Tax Cas. 602.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

Under warrant of the Act of Congress approved August 5, 1909 (36 Stat. at L. 11, 113, chap. 6), the government collected from the claimant, a corporation organized as an insurance company under the laws of Maryland, an excise tax for the years 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912, and, under warrant of the Act of Congress of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 114, 166, chap. 16, Comp. Stat. § 5291, 2 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 724), it likewise collected an excise tax for the first two months of 1913, and an income tax for the remaining months of that year.

This suit, instituted in the court of claims, to recover portions of such payments claimed to have been unlawfully collected, is here for review upon appeal from the judgment of that court.

The claimant was engaged in casualty liability, fidelity, guaranty, and surety insurance, but the larger part of its business was employers' liability, accident, and, in the later of the years under consideration in this case, workmen's compensation insurance.

By process of elimination the essential questions of difference between the parties ultimately became three, viz.:

(1) Should claimant be charged, as a part of its gross income each year, with premiums collected by agents, but not transmitted by them to its treasurer within the year?

(2) May the amount of gross income of the claimant be reduced by the aggregate amount of the taxes, salaries, brokerage, and reinsurance unpaid at the end of each year, under the provisions in both the excise and income [345] tax laws allowing deductions of "net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds?"

(3) Should the decrease in the amount of reserve funds required by law for the year 1913 from the amount required for 1912 be treated as "released reserve," and charged to the company as income for 1913?

Of these in the order stated:

First: Section 38 of the Excise Tax Act (36 Stat. at L. 112, chap. 6, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 260) provides that every corporation, organized under the laws of any state as an insurance company, "shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business . . . equivalent to one per centum upon the entire net income . . . received by it from all sources during such year."

The Income Tax Act (38 Stat. at L. 172, chap. 16, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 245) provides (§ G, paragraph (a)) that the tax shall be levied upon the entire "net income arising or accruing from all sources during the preceding calendar year." But in paragraph (b), providing for deductions, gross income is described as that "received within the year from all sources." So that, with respect to domestic corporations, it is clear enough that no change was intended by the use of the expression "arising or accruing," in the Income Tax Act, and that the tax should be levied under both acts upon the income "received" during the year. Southern P. Co. v. Lowe, 247 U. S. 330, 335, 62 L. ed. 1142, 1147, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540.

The claimant did business in many states, through many agents, with whom it had uniform written contracts which allowed them to extend the time for payment of the premiums on policies, not to exceed thirty days from the date of policy, and required that on the fifth day of each calendar month they should pay or remit, in cash or its equivalent, the balance due claimant as shown by the last preceding monthly statement rendered to it.

[346] Under the provisions of such contracts obviously the agents were not required to remit premiums on policies written in November until the 5th of January of the next year, and on policies written in December, not until the following February.

Much the largest item of the gross income of the company was premiums collected on policies of various kinds. Omitting reference to earlier and tentative returns by the claimant and amendments by the government, it came about that claimant took the final position that the only premiums with which it could properly be charged as net income "received by it . . . during each year" were such as were collected and actually paid to its treasurer within the year. This involved omitting from gross income each year "premiums in course of collection by agents, not reported on December 31st," which varied in amount from $584,000 in one year to $1,020,000 in another. The amount, if deducted one year, might appear in the return of the claimant for the next year, but the rate might be different.

The government, on the other hand, contended that the claimant should return the full amount of premiums on policies written in each year, whether actually collected or not.

The court of claims refused to accept the construction of either of the parties, and held that the claimant should have returned, not all premiums written by it, but all which were actually received by it during the year, and that receipt by its agents was receipt by the company, within the meaning of the act of Congress.

The claimant contends that premiums paid to its agents, but not remitted to its treasurer, were not "received by it during the year," chiefly for the reason that while in possession of the agents the money could not be attached as the company's property (Maxwell v. McGee, 12 Cush. 137), and because money, while thus in [347] the possession of agents, was not subject to beneficial use by the claimant, and therefore cannot, with propriety, be said to have been received by it, within the meaning of the act.

On the other hand, it is conclusively argued: That payment of the premium to the agent discharged the obligation of the insured and called into effect the obligation of the insurer as fully as payment to the treasurer of the claimant could have done; that in the popular or generally accepted meaning of the words "received by it" (which must be given to them. Maillard v. Lawrence, 16 How. 251, 14 L. ed. 925), receipt by an agent is regarded as receipt by his principal; that, under their contract, collected premiums in possession of the agents of the claimant were subject to use by it in an important respect before they were transmitted to the treasurer of the company, for the agency contract provided that "the agent will pay on demand, out of any funds collected by him for account of premium, and not remitted to the company, such drafts as may be drawn on him by the company . . . for the purpose of settling claims, deducting the amount from the next succeeding monthly remittance;" and that only imperative language in the statute would justify a construction which would place it in the power of the claimant, by private contract with its agents, to shift payment of taxes from one taxing year into another.

The claimant withheld from its returns collections in the custody of its agents at the end of each year, and because in its amendments the government had included all premiums written in each year, whether or not collected, the court of claims, having reached the conclusion thus approved by us, allowed the claimant ninety days in which to show the amount of premiums received by it and its agents within each of the years in controversy, but the claimant failed to make such a showing, and thereupon the court treated the return of premiums [348] written as the correct one, and very properly, so far as this item is concerned, dismissed claimant's petition.

Second: In the same words the Excise and Income Tax Acts provide that "the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds," may be deducted from gross, in determining the amount of net, income to be taxed.

Finding its authority in this provision of the law, the claimant in all of its returns treated as "reserves," for the purpose of determining whether the aggregate amount of them each year was greater or less than in the preceding year, and of thereby arriving at the "net addition to reserve funds" which it was authorized to deduct from gross income, the following, among others, viz.: "Reserve for unearned premiums," "Special reserve for unpaid liability losses," and "Loss claims reserve." Unearned premium reserve and special reserve for unpaid liability losses are familiar types of insurance reserves, and the government, in its amended returns, allowed these two items, but rejected the third, "Loss claims reserve."

The court of claims, somewhat obscurely, held that the third item should also be allowed. This "loss claims reserve" was intended to provide for the liquidation of claims for unsettled losses (other than those provided for by the reserve for liability losses) which had accrued at the end of the tax year for which the return was made and the reserve computed. The finding that the insurance department of Pennsylvania, pursuant to statute, has at all times since and including 1909 required claimant to keep on hand, as a condition of doing business in that state, "assets as reserves sufficient to cover outstanding losses," justifies the deduction of this reserve as one required by law to be maintained, and the holding that it should have been allowed for all of the years involved is approved.

[349] But the court of claims approved the action of the government in rejecting other claimed deductions of reserves for "unpaid taxes, salaries, brokerage, and reinsurance due other companies." The court gave as its reason for this conclusion that the "net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds" which the act of Congress permitted to be deducted from gross income, was limited to reserves required by express statutory provision, and did not apply to reserves required by the rules and regulations of state insurance departments, when promulgated in the exercise of an appropriate power conferred by statute.

In this the court of claims fell into error. It is settled by many recent decisions of this court that a regulation by department of government, addressed to and reasonably adapted to the enforcement of an act of Congress, the administration of which is confided to such department, has the force and effect of law if it be not in conflict with express statutory provision. United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, 55 L. ed. 563, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 480; United States v. Birdsall, 233 U. S. 223, 231, 58 L. ed. 930, 934, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 512; United States v. Smull, 236 U. S. 405, 409, 411, 59 L. ed. 641–643, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; United States v. Morehead, 243 U. S. 607, 61 L. ed. 926, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458. The law is not different with respect to the rules and regulations of a department of a state government.

But it is contended by the claimant that it was required to provide "reserves" for the payment of the rejected items of liability: because the court of claims found that, pursuant to statutes, the insurance department of Pennsylvania required the company, as a condition of doing business in that state, to keep on hand "assets as reserves" sufficient to cover all claims against the company, "whether due or accrued;" because the department of New York required it to maintain "reserves sufficient to meet all of its accrued but unpaid indebtedness in each year;" and because the department of Wisconsin required it to carry "sufficient reserves to cover all of its outstanding liabilities."

[350] Whether this contention of the claimant can be justified or not depends upon the meaning which is to be given to the words "reserve funds" in the two acts of Congress we are considering.

The term "reserve" or "reserves" has a special meaning in the law of insurance. While its scope varies under different laws, in general it means a sum of money, variously computed or estimated, which, with accretions from interest, is set aside, "reserved," as a fund with which to mature or liquidate, either by payment or reinsurance with other companies, future unaccrued and contingent claims, and claims accrued, but contingent and indefinite as to amount or time of payment.

In this case, as we have seen, the term includes "unearned premium reserve" to meet future liabilities on policies,

"liability reserve" to satisfy claims, indefinite in amount and as to time of payment, but accrued on liability and workmen's compensation policies, and "reserve for loss claims" accrued on policies other than those provided for in the "liability reserve," but it has nowhere been held that "reserve," in this technical sense, must be maintained to provide for the ordinary running expenses of a business, definite in amount, and which must be currently paid by every company from its income if its business is to continue, such as taxes, salaries, reinsurance, and unpaid brokerage.

The requirements relied upon, of the insurance departments of New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, that "assets as reserves" must be maintained to cover "all claims," "all indebtedness," "all outstanding liabilities," in terms might include the rejected items we are considering; but plainly the departments, in these expressions, used the word "reserves" in a nontechnical sense as equivalent to "assets," as is illustrated by the Massachusetts requirement that each company shall "hold or reserve assets" for the payment of all claims and obligations. [351] The distinction between the "reserves" and general assets of a company is obvious and familiar, and runs through the statements of claimant and every other insurance company. That provision for the payment of ordinary expenses such as we are considering was not intended to be provided for and included in "reserve funds," as the term is used in the acts of Congress, is plain from the fact that the acts permit deductions for such charges from income if paid within the year, and the claimant was permitted in this case to deduct large sums for such ordinary expenses of the business,—specifically, large sums for taxes. The claimant did not regard any such charges as properly covered by "reserves," and did not so include them in its statement for 1909. In its 1910 return "unpaid taxes" and "salaries" first appear as "reserves," and in 1911 "brokerage" and "reinsurance" are added. This earlier, though it is now claimed to have been an uninstructed or inexpert, interpretation of the language of the acts, was nevertheless the candid and correct interpretation of it, and the judgment of the court of claims in this respect is approved.

Third: The year 1913 was the only one of those under consideration in which the aggregate amount of reserves which the claimant was required by law to keep fell below the amount so required for the preceding year. The government allowed only "unearned premium" and "unpaid liability loss" reserves to be considered in determining deductions. In 1913 the "unpaid liability loss reserve" decrease exceeded the "unearned premium reserve" increase by over $270,000, and this amount the government added to the gross income of the claimant for the year, calling it "released reserve" on the theory that the difference in the amount of the reserves for the two years released the decrease to the claimant so that it could use it for its general purposes, and therefore constituted free income for the year 1913, in which the decrease occurred.

[352] This theory of the government was accepted by the court of claims, and the addition to the gross income was approved.

The statute does not in terms dispose of the question thus presented.

Reserves, as we have seen, are funds set apart as a liability in the accounts of a company to provide for the payment or reinsurance of specific, contingent liabilities. They are held not only as security for the payment of claims, but also as funds from which payments are to be made. The amount "reserved" in any given year may be greater than is necessary for the required purposes, or it may be less than is necessary, but the fact that it is less in one year than in the preceding year does not necessarily show either that too much or too little was reserved for the former year, —it simply shows that the aggregate reserve requirement for the second year is less than for the first, and this may be due to various causes. If, in this case, it were due to an overestimate of reserves for 1912, with a resulting excessive deduction for that year from gross income, and if such excess was released to the general uses of the company and increased its free assets in 1913, to that extent it should very properly be treated as income in the year in which it became so available, for the reason that in that year, for the first time, it became free income, under the system for determining net income provided by the statute, and the fact that it came into the possession of the company in an earlier year in which it could be used only in a special manner, which permitted it to become nontaxable, would not prevent its being considered as received in 1913 for the purposes of taxation, within the meaning of the act.

The findings of fact in this case, however, do not show that the diminution in the amount of required reserves was due to excessive reserves in prior years or to any other cause by which the free assets of the company were increased [353] in the year 1913, and the following finding of fact makes strongly against such a conclusion:

"The decrease in employers' liability loss reserve for 1913, designated as 'released reserve,' did not in any respect affect or change claimant's gross income or disbursements, as shown by the state insurance reports."

It would not be difficult to suggest conditions under which the statutory permit to deduct net additions to reserve funds would result in double deduction in favor of an insurance company, but such deductions can be restored to income again only where it is clearly shown that subsequent business conditions have released the amount of them to the free beneficial use of the company in a real, and not in a mere bookkeeping, sense. If this seemingly favorable treatment of insurance companies is to be otherwise corrected or changed, it is for Congress, and not for the courts, to amend the law.

Since the findings of fact before us do not make the clear showing, which must be required, that the statutory deduction of net reserves in prior years was restored to the free use of the claimant in 1913, it should not have been charged as income with the decrease in that year, and, on the record before us, the holding of the court of claims must be reversed.

There remains the question as to the Statute of Limitations.

The government concedes that the case is in time with respect to the amended returns, but claims that it is barred by Rev. Stat. §§ 3226–3228, Comp. Stat. §§ 5949–5951, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 1034, 1037, with respect to taxes paid on the original returns for all of the years but 1913. The claimant made its original returns without protest except for the year 1909, and, without appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, voluntarily paid the taxes computed on them for each of the years. Payment was made for 1909 in June, 1910; for 1910 in June, 1911; for 1911 in June, 1912; for 1912 in June, 1913. No [354]claim for a refund of any of these payments was made until April 30, 1915, and then the claim was in general terms.

"For amounts paid by it in taxes which, through lack of information as to requirements of law, or by error in computation, it may have paid in excess of the amount legally due."

This claim was rejected subsequent to the institution of this suit, which was commenced on February 8, 1916.

This statement shows the right of the claimant plainly barred by its failure to appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Rev. Stat. § 3226 [this is fundamental, King's County Sav. Inst. v. Blair, 116 U. S. 200, 29 L. ed. 657, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 353], and also by its failure to institute suit within two years after the cause of action accrued, Rev. Stat. § 3227.

The claimant contends that the amended returns filed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue were not amendments or modifications of the original returns, but were based upon a different principle, and, within the scope of Cheatham v. United States (Cheatham v. Norvekl) 92 U. S. 85, 23 L. ed. 561, constituted new assessments from which appeals were taken in time.

But they are denominated "amended returns," and while, in dealing with the same items, the basis of computation was in some cases varied, in each case the purpose and effect of them was to increase the payment which the claimant was required to make under the law, and the payments made on the original returns were credited on the amounts computed as due on the returns as amended.

The inapplicability of Cheatham v. United States, supra, is obvious, and the contention that the filing of the amended returns constituted the beginning of new proceedings which so superseded the original returns as to release the claimant from its entire failure to observe the statutory requirement for review of the latter is so unfounded [355] that we cannot consent to enter upon a detailed discussion of it. This conclusion renders § 14 of the Act of Congress of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. at L. 772, chap. 463, Comp. Stat. § 6336n, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 335), inapplicable.

It results that the judgment of the Court of Claims is modified, and as so modified affirmed, and the case is remanded to that court for proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

EASTERN EXTENSION, AUSTRALASIA & CHINA TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Limited, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

Claims — against United States — implied contract — cable subsidies.

No contract, express or implied, on the part of the United States, justiciable in the court of claims, to pay the annual subsidies provided for in a Spanish concession for the construction and operation of submarine cables in the Philippine Islands, can be deduced from the use of such cables by the United States government at the reduced rate prescribed in such concession for official despatches, where this was the full rate demanded by the cable company, nor from the acceptance by subordinate officials of the Philippine government of the tax on receipts from messages computed as required by such concession, nor from a statement of account showing a balance favorable to the United States which was paid to and accepted by the treasurer of the Philippine government, which statement was prepared without suggestion of demand from the government of the United States, or even from the Philippine government, and in which, in order to give it the form of an account, the company was obliged to treat as unpaid, charges for tolls over the Hongkong-Manila cable, all of which had been paid by the United States government and accepted by the company.

Argued December 15, 1919. Decided January 12, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review the dismissal of a petition seeking to recover an annual cable subsidy from the United States. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Louis Marshall argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant:

Under general principles of jurisprudence the facts as found create an obligation on the part of our government to the claimant to pay the subsidy provided for in the concession, it having availed itself of the general and special rights and privileges which have accrued to it under the terms of the concession.

Assistant Attorney General Davis argued the cause, and, with Mr. W. F. Norris, filed a brief for appellee:

Appellant has failed to establish any implied contract on the part of the United States.

Rep. 840; United States v. Doullut, 130 C. C. A. 243, 213 Fed. 729.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, claimant, is the grantee from the government of Spain of three concessions to lay down and operate submarine cables. The first one, in 1879, was for the exclusive privilege, for forty years, of constructing and operating a cable between the island of Luzon and Hongkong. It was landed at Bolinao, on the northerly coast of Luzon, and despatches were transmitted to Manila and other places by government-owned land lines, which were subject to interruption. This concession required that official messages be transmitted free and be given precedence. In 1898 a second concession, supplemental to the first, empowered the claimant to extend its cable to Manila, and the term of the prior exclusive grant was extended twenty years, with the same priority for official despatches, but, with the provision that they were to be [357] transmitted free, only for the first ten years from the date of this second grant.

In 1897 a third concession, the one with which this case is chiefly concerned, authorized the claimant to lay down and operate three submarine cables, connecting the island of Luzon with three Visayas islands,—Panay, Negros, and Cebu. This grant required the claimant: to operate the cables for twenty years; to give precedence to official despatches and to charge for them at one half the rates charged for private messages; to pay a tax of 10 per cent on receipts in excess of expenses, not to exceed £6,000 per annum, an additional tax of "50 centimes of a franc" per word on telegrams transmitted, and a surtax of "5 centimes of a franc" per word on telegrams between the four islands named in the grant and others of the archipelago.

The government of Spain, on its part, agreed to pay the claimant, in equal monthly instalments, an annual subsidy of £4,500 during the term of the grant.

All of the cables were promptly laid down and put in use and those of the third grant are designated in the record as the "Visayas cables" and the grant as the "Visayas concession." This suit is to recover the amount of the subsidy provided for in the third concession, which had accrued when the petition was filed.

The United States denied all liability, and the judgment of the court of claims, dismissing the petition, is before us for review.

The case was here before on appeal and this court held (231 U. S. 326, 58 L. ed. 250, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57) that the case as then stated in the petition was not within the jurisdiction of the court of claims, whether viewed as asserting an obligation growing directly out of the treaty with Spain or one imposed by principles of international law upon the United States as a consequence of the cession of the Islands by the treaty. The court, however, referring to certain general and indefinite [358] allegations in the petition, suggested that the implication might be drawn from them that there may have been action on the part of officials of the government of the United States since it had assumed sovereignty over the Islands, which, if properly pleaded and proved, would give rise to an implied contract with the claimant outside the treaty, which would be within the jurisdiction of the court of claims, and, to the end that the right to have such a claim adjudicated might be saved, if it really existed, the case was remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion.

Doubtless inspired by the suggestion from the court, an amended petition was filed, in which claimant alleged with much detail, that the government of the United States had used the cables extensively for official messages, which had been given precedence and had been transmitted, as required by the terms of the two concessions, over the Hongkong cable free until 1908, and thereafter at one fourth of the regular rate, and over the Visayas cables at one half the rate charged for private despatches; that the claimant had paid and the government accepted the 10 per cent tax on receipts from messages, computed as required by the third concession; that since the American occupation the service over the Visayas cables had been extended and improved at large expense by arrangement with duly authorized officers of the government; and that in August, 1905, the claimant had paid and the government had accepted a balance due on an account stated in a form indicating an adoption of the terms of the concessions. By this course of conduct, it was averred, the United States "assumed and adopted" all of the obligations imposed on the government of Spain by the concessions, and agreed with the claimant to discharge and perform all of them, and especially agreed to pay the annual subsidy of £4,500, as required by art. 10 of the third concession.

[359] Trial by the court of claims resulted in findings of fact, as follows:

That the concessions were made to claimant as alleged and that all of the cables were completed and in use when the treaty with Spain was signed, December 10, 1898; that the government used the cables extensively for official despatches, which were given priority in transmission, but that this was in accordance with the International Telegraph Convention, as well as in compliance with the terms of the concessions; that the claimant charged the government for messages over the Visayas cables at one half the rate charged for private despatches, which is the rate prescribed by the third concession, but that it "has paid the full rates charged by the claimant for messages over any of the lines," and claimant had authority to make its own rates; and that it is not true that the claimant transmitted messages over the Hongkong cable free of charge: "The United States government has paid full established rates on the Hongkong-Manila cable."

It is further found that since December, 1901, the claimant has made claim to the subsidy in annual statements to the authorities of the Philippine government, in which the terms of the concession granting it were referred to, and in which the United States was charged with the amount of it then accrued. With respect to these, except as hereinafter noted, the court finds that whether any reply was made to them "does not appear from the record."

Much significance is attached by the claimant to the statement presented on June 11, 1905. The finding with respect to this is that on that date the claimant's representative forwarded to "the secretary of finance and justice," an officer of the Philippine government at Manila, a communication, with an attached statement, purporting to show the amount "due to the United States government in the Philippines on account of transmission [360] of all United States government traffic over the Manila-Hongkong cable, as per the concession granted to us for laying the same, up to and including December 31, 1904."

In this statement the government is credited (as if the amount had not been paid) with what it had paid for service over the Hongkong-Manila cable, laid under the first and second concessions, from August 21, 1898, to December 31, 1904, and it is charged with "Visayas subsidy," under the third concession, £4,500 per annum to December, 1904. Thus a balance was arrived at of £4,712.10.6 in favor of the United States, as to the disposal of which "I shall be glad to receive your instructions," wrote the representative of the claimant.

In reply to this the auditor of the government of the Philippine Islands, to whom it had been referred, wrote to claimant's representative at Manila, acknowledging receipt of his letter, in which it was stated, "There is due the insular government under your concession the sum of £4,712.10.6," and the auditor added: "It is respectfully requested that said amount be deposited with the Insular treasury as miscellaneous revenue." Payment was made and receipt given by the treasurer of the government of the Philippine Islands for the amount as "due government, as per statement of account rendered by Eastern Extension &c. Tel. Co. to Sec. Finance and Justice, June 5, 1911."

Each year after 1905 the claimant sent a statement to the "secretary of finance and justice" at Manila in the form following: "The United States government at Manila in account with the Eastern Extension Australasia & China Tel. Co., Limited. . . . Free transmission of American government telegrams over Hongkong-Manila section." Then follow credits for messages passing over the Hongkong-Manila cable, as if they had not been paid for, and a debit of the "Visayas [361] subsidy" accrued to the date of the statement. To these no reply appears to have been made.

It is expressly found that:

"Except the payment above referred to in 1905, the claimant has never paid anything into the treasury of the Philippine government. It does not appear that any part of said sum was paid into the Treasury of the United States. Nor has the claimant paid any sum to the United States government."

The only payment of the 10 per cent tax under the third concession was that made in 1905, £184.17.2, and the statement showing this balance in favor of the United States concluded:

"I therefore have the honor to request that the necessary permission be given to the treasurer to receive these amounts, now standing to the credit of the United States government in the Philippines."

Of its own motion the claimant, in 1899, made extensions of the Visayas cables at a considerable expense. But the finding with respect to this is:

"These extensions were carried out with the approval of the military authorities in control of the Philippines at the time, and by the sanction of the United States government, but without prejudice to, and with the reservation of, all rights of the government of the United States."

The following is from the court's finding of fact No. IX.:

"Between the 10th day of December, 1898, and March, 1899, considerable correspondence was exchanged between the government of the United States and the claimant regarding the transmission of official telegrams over the Hongkong-Manila cable at reduced rates.

"On the 1st of March, 1899, the Secretary of War transmitted to the chairman of the claimant company a telegram, stating that the War Department 'accepts the courteous offer of your company to transmit messages [362] free between Hongkong and Manila, providing that this acceptance leaves in abeyance Spanish concession which is now under consideration.' On the following day claimant's reply was transmitted to the War Department, stating that the foregoing telegram had been received and the reservation therein noted, and that 'the company have pleasure in affording all possible facilities to the United States government in connection with the transmission of their telegrams.' On the 28th of March, 1899, a written communication was transmitted by the War Department to the duly authorized representative of the claimant company, to the effect that 'upon careful reconsideration of the subject it is deemed inadvisable for the Department to avail itself of your company's offer. I beg to state, therefore, that the Department will pay the established rates on official cable messages, and all accounts of this character presented to the United States will be paid.' This communication concluded with a renewal of thanks 'for the voluntary reduction in rates which your company has so courteously tendered.' The United States government has paid full established rates on Hongkong-Manila cable, and has paid the established rates on the Visayas cables on its messages."

Upon these findings of fact and upon principles and analogies derived from the law of private contract, the court must proceed to judgment. For it was determined by this court on the former appeal, that any right in the defendant derived directly from the treaty with Spain, or any obligation imposed upon the United States by principles of international law as a consequence of the cession of the Islands, would not be within the jurisdiction of the court of claims, and counsel for claimant, expressly disclaiming the assertion of any right under the Treaty of Paris of December 10, 1898 [30 Stat. at L. 1754], urge that the case be treated "exactly as it would be if it arose between two private citizens."

[363] So regarding the case. It is obvious that no express contract by the United States to adopt and be bound by the third or any of the concessions can be made out from the findings of fact, and it is equally clear that such an implied contract, using the words in any strict sense, cannot be derived from the findings, for it is plain that there is nothing in them tending to show that any official with power, express or implied, to commit that government to such a contract, ever intended to so commit it.

The contention of the claimant must be sustained, if at all, as a quasi contract,—as an obligation imposed by law independent of intention on the part of any officials to bind the government,—one which in equity and good conscience the government should discharge because of the conduct of its representatives in dealing with the subject-matter.

It is argued that the United States should be held to have assumed the burden of the concession because it derived benefits and advantages from the use of the cables.

These cables were in operation when the United States government assumed jurisdiction over the Islands. It extended a much more efficient governmental protection over the lines than they had before, but left the claimant in full ownership and control over them, with the power to determine rates for service. The government, to be sure, availed itself of the advantages of communication which the cables afforded, but for such service it paid the rates which the claimant demanded, and which it must be assumed were adequate. From such circumstances as these, very clearly, the law will not raise an obligation on the part of the government to assume the burden of the subsidy on the principle of undue enrichment or of advantage obtained. It used the cables as other customers used them, and from such a use, paid [364] for at the full rate demanded, no obligation can be derived by implication.

It is further contended that the terms and conditions of the concession should be imposed on the government because the officials of the Philippine government accepted taxes computed as provided for by the third grant.

The finding of the court of claims is not that the Philippine government demanded or exacted the small amount of taxes that was paid, but that the claimant itself computed the amount in the manner which it thought was provided for in the concession and tendered payment, which, after repeated urging, was accepted by local officers of the Philippine government, so subordinate in character that it is impossible to consider them as empowered to commit the government of the United States to the large responsibilities now claimed to spring from their conduct.

The finding with respect to extension of the cables in 1899 excludes all suggestion of the assumption of any liability by the United States on account of the expenditure involved.

The form of the statement of account of December 31, 1904, showing a balance favorable to the United States, which was paid to and accepted by the treasurer of the Philippine government, and from which so much is claimed, is not impressive as creating the asserted liability.

Here again the claimant, without suggestion of demand from the government of the United States or even from the Philippine government, prepared a statement, and, in order to give it the form of an account, was obliged to treat as unpaid, charges for tolls over the Hongkong-Manila cable, all of which had been paid by the United States government and accepted by the claimant.

A separate government, sustained by its own revenues, has been maintained for the Philippine Islands ever since they were ceded to the United States. At first military, [365] it became a civil government on July 1, 1902, organized as provided for by an act of Congress (32 Stat. at L. p. 691, chap. 1369, Comp. Stat. § 3804, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1133), with a governor general, and executive, legislative, and judicial departments, all subject to the supervision of the Secretary of War of the United States.

It is surprising that the claimant, when it desired to have these important concessions, with their large obligations, adopted by the government of the United States, did not make application for that purpose directly to that government or to its Secretary of War, or at least to the governor general or legislative department of the Philippine government, instead of relying for its adoption by implication, as it has done, chiefly upon the form in which the accounts were presented to the secretary of finance and justice of the Philippine government.

The action of a department head of the Philippine government (inconsistent with the position taken by the Secretary of War in 1899, with respect to the subject-matter) in accepting a voluntary payment of $23,000 cannot be made the sufficient basis for implying an obligation on the part of the government of the United States to pay a bonus of a total aggregate of almost $440,000.

If doubt could be entertained as to the correctness of this conclusion it would be disposed of by the fact that when the claimant, in March, 1899, tendered to the Secretary of War, so far as appears the only official of the United States with large powers, who considered the subject, the privilege of free transmission of messages over its Hongkong-Manila cable, as was provided for in the first concession, the offer was politely but firmly declined, with the statement that "the Department will pay the established rates on official cable messages and all accounts of this character presented to the United States will be paid"—a promise which the findings show that he and his successors in office have faithfully kept.

In the jurisdiction given to the court of claims Congress [366] has consented that contracts, express or implied, may be judicially enforced against the government of the United States. But such a liability can be created only by some officer of the government lawfully invested with power to make such contracts or to perform acts from which they may be lawfully implied. Langford v. United States, 101 U. S. 341, 345, 25 L. ed. 1010, 1012; United States v. Buffalo Pitts Co. 234 U. S. 228, 58 L. ed. 1290, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 840; Tempel v. United States, 248 U. S. 121, 63 L. ed. 162, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56; Ball Engineering Co. v. J. G. White & Co. 250 U. S. 55, 63 L. ed. 840, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 393.

The foregoing discussion makes it palpably plain that no contract, express or implied, to pay the disputed subsidy, was made by any officer of the United States, and the judgment of the Court of Claims is therefore affirmed.

NAPA VALLEY ELECTRIC COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
RAILROAD COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al.

Judgment — res judicata — denying review — decision on merits.

The denial by the California supreme court, without opinion, of the petition of a public service corporation for the review, conformably to the California Public Utilities Act, § 67, of an order of the state Railroad Commission, sought upon the ground that such order deprived the corporation of its constitutional rights, is the equivalent of a decision adverse to the claims asserted in such petition, and bars a subsequent suit by the corporation to enjoin the enforcement of such order on the same grounds.

[For other cases, see Judgment, III. j, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued December 12, 1919. Decided January 19, 1920.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a decision dismissing the bill in a suit by a public service corporation to enjoin the enforcement of an order of the state Railroad Commission. Affirmed.

See same case below, P.U.R.1917E, 471, 257 Fed. 197.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. L. Beard argued the cause, and Mr. Milton T. U'Ren filed a brief for appellant:

The controversy is not res judicata.

Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 570, 36 L. ed. 266, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522; Montgomery, Fed. Proc.; Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248, 26 L. ed. 135; Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. The rights relied upon by plaintiff are rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution, and no decision of a state court can preclude the Federal court from enforcing those rights.

The orders of the Railroad Commission are not a proper exercise of the police power of the state, in that no rights of the public are affected thereby in any way.

Mr. Douglas Brookman argued the cause and filed a brief for appellees:

The validity of an order of the Railroad Commission in a proceeding fixing the rates of a public utility becomes a justiciable question from the moment the Railroad Commission acts finally on the petition for rehearing filed with it in such proceeding. At that moment the legislative act of rate fixing is complete, and resort may be had to either the Federal court or the state supreme court to test the validity of the rate-fixing order.

Pacific Teleph. & Teleg Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 652, 137 Pac. 1119, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822; Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. S. 210, 53 L. ed. 150, 29 Sup. Ct. The Napa Valley Electric Company having elected to present its cause to the supreme court of California, which court is competent to determine the matter, the company is precluded, under the doctrine of res judicata, from seeking a second adjudication of the same question in the Federal court.

Pacific Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Eshleman, supra; Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Michigan R. Commission, 203 Fed. 864; Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Michigan R. Commission, 235 U. S. 402, 59 L. ed. 288, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 126.

The fact that the supreme court of California made its order denying the petition of the Napa Valley Electric Company to review and reverse the order of the Railroad Commission, without setting the petition for hearing, does not preclude the application of the doctrine of res judicata.

Ghriest v. Railroad Commission, 170 Cal. 63, 148 Pac. 195; Mt. Konocti Light & P. Co. v. Thelen, 170 Cal. 468, P.U.R. 1915E, 291, 150 Pac. 359; E. Clemens Horst Co. v. The Railroad Commission has power to fix the wholesale rates for public utility service, and can exercise the power irrespective of existing contracts specifying the rate for such service.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from decree of the district court, dismissing bill of appellant, herein called the Electric Company, upon motion of appellees, herein called the Commission.

The ground of the motion and the decree sustaining it was that it appeared from the averments of the bill that the controversy it stated was res judicata. The bill is long, but the grounds of it can be stated with fair brevity. The Electric Company is a California corporation and has been engaged for more than ten years in supplying electricity (called in the bill electric energy) for domestic use in the town of St. Helena and vicinity, and the Calistoga Electric Company, also a California corporation, has been for seven years a distributing agency of the Electric Company, and the latter is not, as to the Calistoga Company, a public utility. By virtue of certain circumstances the Electric Company entered into a contract with one E. L. Armstrong, by which it agreed not to extend its lines into Calistoga territory, and Armstrong agreed to buy from it all of the electricity to be sold by him for eighteen years. At that time the Electric Company, under the [368] laws of California, had a right to extend its lines and become a competitor of other companies or individuals.

September 14, 1911, the Calistoga Company became the successor in interest of Armstrong and to his rights and obligations under the contract with the Electric Company, and the Calistoga Company acknowledged the fact of such succession and continued to buy its electricity from the Electric Company at the rates set forth in the contract, until November 18, 1913, when it petitioned the Commission to set aside the contract and compel the Electric Company to accept other rates than those mentioned in the contract.

The Electric Company answered the petition, set up the contract, and alleged that any change in its rates would be a violation of § 10, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, and the 14th Amendment thereto.

January 24, 1914, the Commission instituted an investigation on its own motion which, with the petition of the Calistoga Company, was consolidated. The petitions were heard together upon evidence and submitted.

The Commission subsequently made an order fixing rates much less than those of the contract.

June 20, 1914, the Electric Company filed a petition for rehearing, setting up its rights under the Constitution of the United States. A rehearing was denied.

May 1, 1914, the Electric Company and the Calistoga Company entered into an agreement fixing rates subject to the approval of the Commission, which the Calistoga Company agreed to secure. It did secure an informal approval of them and paid them until June 27, 1916.

The rates fixed by the Commission never became effective, and therefore the Electric Company did not petition for a review of them by the supreme court of the state, nor commence proceedings in any court of the United States to enjoin the order establishing them, or to have it set aside as null and void.

[369] June 27, 1916, the Calistoga Company again petitioned the Commission to establish other rates than those fixed in the agreement of that company with the Electric Company. The latter company filed a counter petition to have established the rates fixed in the contract of May 1, 1914 (reduced to writing September 15, 1914), and the petition and that of the Calistoga Company came on to be heard, and after evidence adduced the Commission, November 15, 1916, reduced the rates fixed in the written contract of September 15, 1914, and made the reduced rates effective December 20, 1916.

A rehearing was denied May 24, 1917, and on June 20, 1917, the Electric Company duly filed a petition in the supreme court of the state of California, praying that a writ of review issue commanding the Commission, on a day named, to certify to the court a full and complete record of the proceedings before it, the Commission, and that upon a return of the writ the orders and decisions of the Commission be reversed, vacated, and annulled upon the ground that they violated the company's rights under the Constitution of the United States, particularly under § 10, article 1, and under § 1 of article 14 of the Amendments thereto. The supreme court of California denied the "petition for writ of review, and refused to issue a writ of review, as prayed for in said petition."

On or about January 27, 1918, the California Light & Telephone Company became a party to the contracts between the Electric Company and the Calistoga Company by reason of conveyances from the latter company.

In the present bill it is alleged that the orders and decisions of the Commission were illegal, were in excess of its jurisdiction, and that the Electric Company has no adequate remedy at law, and prays a decree declaring the orders and decisions null and void, that they be enjoined of enforcement, or made the basis of suits against the company to enforce them.

[370] The Commission and other defendants moved to dismiss on the ground that it appeared from the allegations of the bill that "the subject-matter thereof was res judicata," and that there was no ground stated entitling the company to the relief prayed. The motion was granted, and to the decree adjudging a dismissal of the bill this writ of error is directed.

The district court (Judge Van Fleet) based its ruling upon the allegations of the bill that the Electric Company filed in the supreme court a petition for a review of the decision and order of the Commission and for their annulment, and that the supreme court denied the petition.

The Electric Company to the ruling of the court opposes the contention that the supreme court denied the company's "petition for a preliminary writ, and refused to even cause the record in the case, certified by the Commission, to be brought up," and therefore "simply refused to entertain jurisdiction of the controversy." And it is the further contention that the court could neither affirm nor set aside the orders of the Commission until the record was certified to it and the parties were before it, and after formal hearing in the matter.

The contention is based on § 67 of the Public Utilities Act of the state. The section is too long to quote. It is part of the procedure provided by the state for the execution of its policy in regard to the public utilities of the state, and affords a review of the action of the Commission regulating them. It is quite circumstantial and explicit. It provides for a review of the action of the Commission by writ of certiorari or review from the supreme court of the state, which "shall direct the Commission to certify its record in the case to the court," the cause to "be heard on the record of the Commission as certified by it." No other evidence is to be received, and the review is confined to an inquiry "whether the Commission has regularly pursued its authority" or [371] whether its order or decision "violates any right of the petitioner under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California." The findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact are to be final. The Commission and the parties have the right of appearance, and upon the hearing the court "shall enter judgment either affirming or setting aside the order or decision of the Commission." The Civil Code of the state is made applicable so far as it is not inconsistent with the prescribed proceedings, and no court of the state except the supreme court to the extent specified shall have jurisdiction over any order or decision of the Commission except "that the writ of mandamus shall lie from the supreme court to the Commission in all proper cases."

These provisions, counsel insist, were not observed, and that therefore there was not and could not have been "an adjudication of the controversy" by the supreme court. There was nothing, it is insisted, but the Electric Company's petition before the court, and that none of the essential requirements of § 67 were observed. No writ of review was issued, —none certified by the Commission or returned, no return day fixed or hearing had on a certified record, no appearance of the parties, no order of the court affirming or setting aside of the Commission's order. In other words, the substance of the contention is that the court, instead of hearing, refused to hear; instead of adjudicating, refused to adjudicate; and that from this negation of action or decision there cannot be an assertion of action or decision with the estopping force of res judicata assigned to it by the district court.

Counsel, to sustain the position that he has assumed and contends for, insists upon a literal reading of the statute and a discussion of the elements of res judicata. We need not follow counsel into the latter. They are [372] familiar and necessarily cannot be put out of mind, and the insistence upon the literalism of the statute meets in resistance the common, and, at times, necessary, practice of courts to determine upon the face of a pleading what action should be taken upon it. The petition is not in the record. We may presume it was circumstantial in its exposition of the proceedings before the Commission and of the latter's decisions and orders, and exhibited and submitted to the court the questions it was authorized to entertain,—whether the Commission "pursued its authority, including a determination of whether the order or decision" violated "any right" of the company "under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California."

Whether, upon such an exhibition of the proceedings and questions, the court was required to pursue the details of the section or decide upon the petition was a matter of the construction of the section and the procedure under it. And the supreme court has so decided. Ghriest v. Railroad Commission, 170 Cal. 63, 148 Pac. 195; Mt. Konocti Light & P. Co. v. Thelen, 170 Cal. 468, P.U.R. 1915E, 291, 150 Pac. 359; E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 660, P.U.R.1917F, 893, 166 Pac. 804; C. A. Hooper & Co. v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 811, P.U.R.1917E, 997, 165 Pac. 689. In those cases the applications for writs of certiorari were denied, which was tantamount to a decision of the court that the orders and decisions of the Commission did not exceed its authority or violate any right of the several petitioners under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California. And so with the denial of the petition of the Electric Company,—it had like effect and was the exercise of the judicial powers of the court. And we repeat, to enable the invocation of such powers was the purpose of § 67, and they could be exercised upon the display in the petition of the proceedings before the Commission and of the grounds upon which they were assailed. And [373] we agree with the district court that "the denial of the petition was necessarily a final judicial determination, based on the identical rights" asserted in that court and repeated here. Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248, 255, 26 L. ed. 135, 137. And further, to quote the district court, "Such a determination is as effectual as an estoppel as would have been a formal judgment upon issues of fact." Calaf y Fugural v. Calaf y Rivera, 232 U. S. 371, 58 L. ed. 642, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 411; Hart Steel Co. v. Railroad Supply Co. 244 U. S. 294, 299.

The court held, and we concur, that absence of an opinion by the supreme court did not affect the quality of its decision or detract from its efficacy as a judgment upon the questions presented, and its subsequent conclusive effect upon the rights of the Electric Company. Therefore the decree of the District Court is affirmed.

Writ and process — service on foreign corporation — designated agent — withdrawal from state.

The unrevoked designation by a foreign corporation, conformably to the New York statute, of an agent upon whom service may be made, does not give the corporation a constructive presence in the state, so as to render it amenable to service of process there after it has ceased to do business within the state, in an action based upon contracts made and to be performed outside the state, there being no allegation of performance within the state, nor that the causes of action arose out of acts or transactions within the state, although it is asserted that at all of the times of the duration of the contracts sued on and their breaches the corporation was doing business in the state, and at any time had the right to transact business therein, and that the contracts contemplated that they might be performed within the state.

Submitted December 8, 1919. Decided January 19, 1920.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review an order setting aside service of summons on a foreign corporation and dismissing the complaint for lack of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. Affirmed.

See same case below, 260 Fed. 856.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.—On service of process, in action not arising out of business transacted within the state, upon the agent of a foreign corporation, appointed pursuant to statute to receive service—see note to Bagdon v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. L.R.A.1916F. 410.

Mr. Daniel P. Hays submitted the cause for plaintiff in error. Mr. Ralph Wolf was on the brief:

The defendant having filed an express consent that made service upon its designated agent the equivalent of personal service, no constitutional question is involved.

Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. v. Gold Issue Min. & Mill. Co. 243 U. S. 93, 61 L. ed. 610, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 344; Gibbs v. Queen City Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 114, 20 Am. Rep. 513; Cable v. United States L. Ins. Co. 191 U. S. 288, 48 L. ed. 188, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 74; Lancaster v. Amsterdam Improv. Co. 140 N. Y. 588, 24 L.R.A. 322, 35 N. E. 964; Olcott v. Tioga R. Co. 20 N. Y. 210, 75 Am. Dec. 393; Wehrenberg v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 124 App. Div. 205, 108 N. Y. Supp. 704; Bagdon v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 217 N. Y. 432, L.R.A. 1916F, 407, 111 N. E. 1075; Ann. Cas. 1918A, 389; Smolik v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 222 Fed. 148.

It is not open to argument that the supreme court of the state of New York has jurisdiction of an action by plaintiff, a domestic corporation, against the defendant, a foreign corporation, for a cause of action based on contract.

Tauza v. Susquehanna Coal Co. 220 N. Y. 268, 115 N. E. 915; Grant v. Cananea Consol. Copper Co. 189 N. Y. 241, 82 N. E. 191.

It is equally clear that the service of the summons upon the designated agent gave to the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant.

Bagdon v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 217 N. Y. 432, L.R.A.1916F, 407, 111 N. E. 1075, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 389; Woodward v. Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. 178 N. Y. 485, 102 Am. St. Rep. 519, 71 N. Co. 134 Minn. 261, 159 N. W. 272; Germania Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 112 Ky. 303, 99 Am. St. Rep. 295, 65 S. W. 611; State ex rel. Watkins v. North American Land & Timber Co. 106 La. 621, 87 Am. By reason of its failure to revoke its certificate, it had a principal place of business, as well as an agent, within the state. This was sufficient to bring the corporation within the state, so as to render it amenable to process.

Messrs. Philip B. Adams and Thomas M. Kearney submitted the cause for defendant in error:

The prohibition contained in the statute emphasizes the construction that its whole subject-matter pertains only to business transacted within the state.

Penn Collieries Co. v. McKeever, 183 N. Y. 98, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 127, 75 N. E. 935.

The extraterritorial extension of the operation of this statute would read into it an addition that was foreign to the purpose of the legislature.

United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 486, 19 L. ed. 278, 280.

A corporation, after it has ceased to do business within a state, may not be compelled to answer in the courts of that state a cause of action that had its origin and arose without that state.

Smolik v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 222 Fed. 151; Simon v. Southern R. Co. 236 U. S. 115, 130, 59 L. ed. 492, 500, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error was plaintiff in the courts below; defendant in error was defendant; and we shall refer to them respectively as plaintiff and defendant.

The action was brought in the supreme court of the state of New York and removed upon motion of the defendant to the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York. In the latter court defendant made a motion for an order vacating and setting aside the service of summons, and dismissing the complaint for lack of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The motion was granted and the case is here on the jurisdictional question only.

A brief summary of the grounds of action and the proceedings upon the motion to dismiss is all that is necessary. Plaintiff is a New York corporation, defendant one under the laws of Wisconsin, and a manufacturer and seller of motor cars known as the "Jeffrey" and "Rambler" and parts thereof, and motor trucks and parts thereof. By contracts, in writing, made in Wisconsin by the plaintiff and defendant, it was agreed that the former should have the sole right to sell the motor cars and parts [377] thereof (first cause of action) and the motor trucks and parts thereof (second cause of action) of defendant in Europe and certain other foreign places and to receive certain designated percentages. The contracts as to motor cars and their parts, and the trucks and their parts, provided that they (cars, trucks, and parts) should be sold and delivered to plaintiff (called in the contracts the "distributor") at Kenosha, Wisconsin, for sale at the designated places by plaintiff, defendant reserving the right to fill the orders of plaintiff (distributor) for the cars, trucks, and parts, from any of its, defendant's, depots in New York city. Cars and trucks purchased under the contracts to be paid for at Kenosha. Both contracts continued in effect to July 31, 1915.

There are allegations of performance of the contracts by plaintiff, their nonperformance by defendant, whereby plaintiff on one cause of action was entitled, it is alleged, to $280,000 and upon the other, $600,000. Judgment is prayed for their sum, to wit, $880,000.

The district court has certified three questions, but as the first includes the other two, we give it only, as it sufficiently presents the question at issue: "Whether in the service of summons as shown by the record herein upon Philip B. Adams, this court acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant."

Plaintiff contends for an affirmative answer and adduces the New York statute which requires of corporations not organized under the laws of New York, as a condition of doing business in the state, to file in the office of the secretary of state a stipulation designating "a place within the state which is to be its principal place of business, and designating a person upon whom process against the corporation may be served within the state," and the person designated must consent, and the designation

"shall continue in force until revoked by an instrument in writing" designating some other person.

[378] Defendant complied with the requirements of the statute July 6, 1914, designating 21 Park Row, New York, as its place of business, and Philip B. Adams as its agent upon whom process might be served. The designation and appointment have not been revoked.

It is not denied, however, that defendant had removed from the state before service on Adams, and as we have stated, the contracts sued on made the place of their performance Kenosha, Wisconsin. But in emphasis of the requirement of the statute, it is urged that at all of the times of the duration of the contracts sued on and their breaches defendant was doing business in the state, and at any time had the right to transact business in the state. It is further urged that the contracts contemplated they might be performed within the state. There is no allegation of such performance, nor that the present causes of action arose out of acts or transactions within the state. The other circumstances of emphasis may be disregarded, as the validity of the service depends upon the statute, assuming it to be controlling; that is, whether, under its requirements, the unrevoked designation of Adams as an agent of defendant gave the latter constructive presence in the state. And making that assumption of the control of the statute, which we do in deference to counsel's contention, for light we must turn to New York decisions, and there is scarcely ambiguity in them, though the facts in none of them included an actual absence from the state of the corporation with which they, the cases, were concerned.

Bagdon v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 217 N. Y. 432, L.R.A.1916F, 407, 111 N. E. 1075, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 389, passed upon the effect of a cause of action arising out of the state, the corporation, however, doing business within the state, and having complied with the statute in regard to its place of business and the designation of an agent upon whom process could be served. But the court, throughout the opinion, with conscious solicitude [379] of the necessity of making the ground of its decision the fact that the corporation was doing business in the state, dwelt upon the fact, and distinguished thereby Old Wayne Mut. Life Asso. v. McDonough, 204 U. S. 8, 51 L. ed. 345, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236, and Simon v. Southern R. Co. 236 U. S. 115, 59 L. ed. 492, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, in both of which the causes of action were based on transactions done outside of the states in which the suits were brought.

Tauza v. Susquehanna Coal Co. 220 N. Y. 259, 115 N. E. 915, is nearer in principle of decision than the case just commented upon. The question of the doing of business within the state by the coal company was in the case and was discussed. But the question was unconnected with a statutory designation of a place of business or of an agent to receive service of process. However, there was an implication of agency in the coal company's sales agent under other provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state, and it was considered that the principle of Bagdon v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. supra, applied. But the court went further and left no doubt of the ground of its decision. It said: "Unless a foreign corporation is engaged in business within the state, it is not brought within the state by the presence of its agents," citing and deferring to St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Alexander, 227 U. S. 218, 57 L. ed. 486, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 245, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 77. And further said: "The essential thing is that the corporation shall have come into the state." If prior cases have a different bent, they must be considered as overruled, as was recognized in Robert Dollar Co. v. Canadian Car & Foundry Co. 220 N. Y. 270, 277, 115 N. E. 711.

In resting the case on New York decisions we do not wish to be understood that the validity of such service as here involved would not be of Federal cognizance, whatever the decision of a state court, and refer to Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Alexander, supra; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. McKibbin, 243 U. S. 264, 61 L. ed. 710, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280; Meisukas v. Greenough Red [380] Ash Coal Co. 244 U. S. 54, 61 L. ed. 987, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593; People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co. 246 U. S. 79, 62 L. ed. 587, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 223, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 537.

It follows that the District Court did not have jurisdiction of defendant, and its order and judgment dismissing the complaint are affirmed.

Appeal — harmless error — refusing challenge of juror for cause.

Any error in overruling defendant's challenge of a juror for cause in a homicide case could not have prejudiced the accused, where such juror was excluded on peremptory challenge, and the accused was allowed one more than the statutory number of peremptory challenges, and had other peremptory challenges which he might use after the ruling and challenge to this juror,—the record not disclosing that other than an impartial jury sat on the trial.

Petition for rehearing received January 5, 1920. Decided January 19, 1920.

PETITION for rehearing. Denied. See ante, 103.

Messrs. Isaac B. Kimbrell and Martin J. O'Donnell for plaintiff in error on petition for rehearing.

Memorandum opinion by direction of the court, by Mr. Justice Day:

In this proceeding on November 24, 1919, this court affirmed the judgment of the United States district court for the district of Kansas, rendered upon a verdict convicting the plaintiff in error of murder in the first degree.

A petition for rehearing has been presented. It has been considered, and we find occasion to notice only so [381] much thereof as refers to the refusal of the court below to sustain the plaintiff in error's challenge for cause as to the juror Williamson. The other grounds urged have been examined and found to be without merit.

Williamson was called as a juror, and, as we said in our former opinion, was challenged for cause by the plaintiff in error. This challenge was overruled, and the juror was then challenged peremptorily by the accused. The testimony of Williamson made it reasonably certain that, in the event of conviction for murder in the first degree, he would render no other verdict than one which required capital punishment. Granting that this challenge for cause should have been sustained, and that this ruling required the plaintiff in error to use one of his peremptory challenges to remove the juror from the panel, we held that the refusal to sustain the challenge was not prejudicial error, as the record disclosed that the defendant was allowed twenty-two peremptory challenges, when the law allowed but twenty.

In the petition for rehearing it is alleged that the record discloses that in fact the accused was allowed twenty peremptory challenges and no more, and this allegation is accompanied by an affidavit of counsel giving the names of twenty persons challenged peremptorily by the plaintiff in error, and stating that no other peremptory challenges were allowed to him at the trial. In this statement the counsel is mistaken. An examination of the original transcript, as also the printed transcript, shows that a juror, H. A. Shearer, was called and examined upon his voir dire (printed transcript, page 79) and later was peremptorily challenged by the plaintiff in error (printed transcript, page 143), and excused from the panel. H. A. Shearer's name does not appear upon the list of those as to whom peremptory challenges were made and sustained in plaintiff in error's behalf as given in the petition and affidavit for [382] a rehearing. It does appear in the transcript that plaintiff in error was allowed twenty-one peremptory challenges, and it follows that his right to exercise such challenges was not abridged to his prejudice by the failure to allow the single challenge for cause which, in our opinion, should have been sustained by the trial judge. Furthermore, the record shows that after the ruling and challenge as to Williamson, the plaintiff in error had other peremptory challenges which he might have used; and the record does not disclose that other than an impartial jury sat on the trial. See Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131, 168, 31 L. ed. 80, 86, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21, 22, and cases cited.

It follows that the petition for rehearing must be denied.

So ordered.

Note.—As to challenges to jurors—see notes to Harrison v. United States, 41 L. ed. U. S. 104, and Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shane, 39 L. ed. U. S. 727.

Claims — for Indian depredations — reinstatement.

1. A claim for Indian depredations which was dismissed by the court of claims on the ground that the band committing the depredations was not in amity with the United States was not reinstated by the Act of January 11, 1915, amending the Act of March 3, 1891, so that in all claims for property of citizens or inhabitants of the United States taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States the alienage of the claimant will not be a defense, with a proviso that claims dismissed for want of proof of citizenship or alienage shall be reinstated.

[For other cases, see Claims, 145-163, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Limitation of actions — claims against United States — Indian depredations.

2. Considered as a new claim, a suit brought since the amendment of January 11, 1915, to the Act of March 3, 1891, to recover for depredations committed by a hostile band from an Indian tribe in amity with the United States, is barred by the three years' limitation in the original act.

Argued January 13, 1920. Decided January 26, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment dismissing on demurrer the petition in a suit to recover for Indian depredations. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 320.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Harry Peyton argued the cause and filed a brief for appellant.

Assistant Attorney General Davis argued the cause, and, with Mr. George T. Stormont, filed a brief for appellees.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the court of claims dismissing the appellant's petition upon demurrer. The claim is for depredations committed on June 10, 1866, by a band of the Ute tribe of Indians, known as Blackhawk's band. The Act of March 3, 1891, chap. 538, § 1, 26 Stat. at L. 851, gave jurisdiction to the court of claims over all claims for property of citizens taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any band, tribe, or nation in amity with the United States. See Rev. Stat. § 2156, Act of June 30, 1834, chap. 161, § 17, 4 Stat. at L. 729, 731, Comp. Stat. § 4159, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 816. The appellant's intestate filed his claim, but on June 13, 1898, the court of claims held that the Blackhawk band of Utes was not in amity with the United States, and dismissed the petition. The present petition relies upon the Act of January 11, 1915, chap. 7, 38 Stat. at L. 791, amending the first section of the Act of 1891 so that in all claims for property of citizens or inhabitants of the United States, taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, etc., the alienage of the claimant shall not be a defense to said claims, with provisos to be mentioned. The present petition, filed September 21, 1917, alleges that the tribe of Utes was in amity with the United States.

The claimant contends that the amendment had two purposes,—not merely to give inhabitants the same rights as citizens, but also to admit claims for damage done by hostile bands from a tribe that maintained its amity, subject to a proviso that suit had been brought upon them [384] theretofore in the court of claims. It is said that claims of that nature that still were pending in the court have been awarded judgment under the new jurisdiction. Another proviso in the act is that claims that have been dismissed by the court for want of proof of citizenship or alienage shall be reinstated, and the petition prays that the former claim be consolidated with this suit, and that judgment be awarded upon the evidence filed in the former case. It is pointed out as an anomaly that the case of a neighbor of the intestate who suffered damage from the same band on the same day was reinstated and passed to judgment, his claim having been dismissed at an earlier date because he was not a citizen at the time.

But we are of opinion that the judgment of the court of claims was plainly right. The emphasis and primary intent, at least, of the Act of 1915, was to remove the defense of alienage. When it goes on by an express proviso to reinstate claims dismissed upon that ground, and says nothing as to the other class, it is impossible to extend the words. According to the claimant's necessary argument, Congress had claims for damage by hostile bands before its eyes. On the face of the act it had before them also the matter of reinstatement. Yet it did not purport to reinstate claims of the present class. According to the claimant's account there was something for the act to operate on in the way of damage by hostile bands, and the words cannot be carried further than they go. The court of claims rightly held that the old claim was not reinstated, and that, considered as a new claim, the present suit was barred by the three years' limitation in the original act.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Search and seizure — use of evidence wrongfully obtained — compelling production of papers.

1. The knowledge gained by the Federal government's own wrong in seizing papers in violation of the owners' constitutional protection against unlawful searches and seizures cannot be used by the government in a criminal prosecution by serving subpœnas upon such owners to produce the original papers, which it had returned after copies had been made, and by obtaining a court order commanding compliance with such subpœnas.

[For other cases, see Search and Seizure; Evidence, VIII. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Search and seizure — protection of corporation — compulsory production of papers.

2. The rights of a corporation against unlawful searches and seizures are to be protected, even if the same result might have been achieved in a lawful way, i. e., by an order for the production of its books and papers.

[For other cases, see Search and Seizure, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued December 12, 1919. Decided January 26, 1920.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of New York to review a judgment imposing fine and imprisonment for a contempt of court. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William D. Guthrie argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Henry W. Killeen and James O. Moore, filed a brief for plaintiffs in error:

There is no longer any doubt that a corporation is protected by the guaranty of the 4th Amendment against unreasonable searches and seizures in as full a measure as any natural person.

Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S. 43, 75, 76, 50 L. ed. 652, 665, 666, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 370; Re Tri-State Coal & Coke Co. 253 Fed. 605; United States v. McHie, 194 Fed. 898; United States v. McQuade, U. S. D. C. E. D. N. Y. Thomas, D. J. (not yet reported); Coastwise Lumber & Supply Co. v. United States, 259 Fed. 849; Re Pacific R. Commission, 32 Fed. 265.

The same considerations of fundamental policy which protect corporations in their property and guarantee them the equal protection of the laws, liberty and due process of law, operate to preserve them from the oppression and lawlessness that inhere in an illegal and unreasonable search and seizure of private papers and effects by a public official. An orderly constitutional government can require of its officers and grant to its citizens no less.

Veeder v. United States, — C. C. A. —, 252 Fed. 418, 246 U. S. 675, 62 L. ed. 933, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428.

In the case at bar the officers who perpetrated the search of the Lumber Company's premises, and the seizure of its books, papers, and documents, were armed with no search warrant or other process which purported to authorize any of them to make any search or seizure whatever. They did not even hold an invalid search warrant. All that they had was a void subpœna duces tecum; and, under the color of that, they ransacked the company's premises and stripped it of all its books, papers, and documents, and carried them away. A subpœna duces tecum may never be served or executed in any such manner.

Messrs. William D. Guthrie, Frederic D. McKenney, Myer Cohen, Henry W. Killeen, and James O. Moore also filed a brief for plaintiffs in error in opposition to the motion to dismiss or affirm.

Assistant Attorney General Stewart argued the cause, and, with Mr. W. C. Herron, filed a brief for defendant in error:

The terms of the subpœnas were not so broad as to constitute, for that reason alone, an unreasonable search and seizure.

McHie, 196 Fed. 586; Re Rosenwasser Bros. 254 Fed. 171.

Certain decisions where a motion to return papers was granted or an impounding order refused can all, with one exception, be explained upon the ground that the papers in question would not have been admissible in evidence as against a claim of immunity under the 5th Amendment, and hence to bring them into or retain them in the custody of the court would have been an idle thing, serving no legitimate purpose. Such cases are: United States v. Mills, 185 Fed. 318; United States v. McHie, 194 Fed. 894; United States v. Mounday, 208 Fed. 186; United States v. Jones, 230 Fed. 262; United States v. The one exception is the case of Re Tri-State Coal & Coke Co. 253 Fed. 605, where the court clearly overlooked the rule that a corporation cannot plead immunity from self-incrimination, and therefore the books, etc., in question, in so far as relevant, should have been retained by the court, irrespective of the invalidity of the search warrant.

Solicitor General King filed a brief in support of the motion to dismiss or affirm.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error brought to reverse a judgment of the district court, fining the Silverthorne Lumber Company $250 for contempt of court, and ordering Frederick W. Silverthorne to be imprisoned until he should purge himself of a similar contempt. The contempt in question was a refusal to obey subpœnas and an order of court to produce books and documents of the company before the grand jury, to be used in regard to alleged violation of the statutes of the United States by the said Silverthorne and his father. One ground of the refusal was that the order of the court infringed the rights of the parties under the 4th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The facts are simple. An indictment upon a single specific charge having been brought against the two Silverthornes mentioned, they both were arrested at their homes early in the morning of February 25, and were detained in custody a number of hours. While they were thus detained representatives of the Department of Justice and the United States marshal, without a shadow of authority, went to the office of their company and made a clean sweep of all the books, papers, and documents found there. All the employees were taken or directed to go to the office of the district attorney of the United States, to which also the books, etc., were taken at once. An application was made as soon as might be to the district [391] court for a return of what thus had been taken unlawfully. It was opposed by the district attorney so far as he had found evidence against the plaintiffs in error, and it was stated that the evidence so obtained was before the grand jury. Color had been given by the district attorney to the approach of those concerned in the act by an invalid subpœna for certain documents relating to the charge in the indictment then on file. Thus the case is not that of knowledge acquired through the wrongful act of a stranger, but it must be assumed that the government planned or at all events ratified the whole performance. Photographs and copies of material papers were made and a new indictment was framed, based upon the knowledge thus obtained. The district court ordered a return of the originals, but impounded the photographs and copies. Subpœnas to produce the originals then were served, and on the refusal of the plaintiffs in error to produce them the court made an order that the subpœnas should be complied with, although it had found that all the papers had been seized in violation of the parties' constitutional rights. The refusal to obey this order is the contempt alleged. The government now, while in form repudiating and condemning the illegal seizure, seeks to maintain its right to avail itself of the knowledge obtained by that means which otherwise it would not have had.

The proposition could not be presented more nakedly. It is that although of course its seizure was an outrage which the government now regrets, it may study the papers before it returns them, copy them, and then may use the knowledge that it has gained to call upon the owners in a more regular form to produce them; that the protection of the Constitution covers the physical possession, but not any advantages that the government can gain over the object of its pursuit by doing the forbidden act. Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 58 L. ed. 652, L.R.A.1915B, 834, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1117, to be sure, had established that laying the papers directly before the grand jury was [392] unwarranted, but it is taken to mean only that two steps are required instead of one. In our opinion such is not the law. It reduces the 4th Amendment to a form of words. 232 U. S. 393. The essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the court, but that it shall not be used at all. Of course this does not mean that the facts thus obtained become sacred and inaccessible. If knowledge of them is gained from an independent source they may be proved like any others, but the knowledge gained by the government's own wrong cannot be used by it in the way proposed. The numerous decisions, like Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585, 48 L. ed. 575, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 372, holding that a collateral inquiry into the mode in which evidence has been got will not be allowed when the question is raised for the first time at the trial, are no authority in the present proceeding, as is explained in Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 394, 395, 58 L. ed. 652, 656, 657, L.R.A.1915B, 834, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1117. Whether some of those decisions have gone too far, or have given wrong reasons, it is unnecessary to inquire; the principle applicable to the present case seems to us plain. It is stated satisfactorily in Flagg v. United States, 147

C. C. A. 367, 233 Fed. 481, 483. In Linn v. United States, 163 C. C. A. 470, 251 Fed. 476, 480, it was thought that a different rule applied to a corporation, on the ground that it was not privileged from producing its books and papers. But the rights of a corporation against unlawful search and seizure are to be protected even if the same result might have been achieved in a lawful way.

Judgment reversed.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Pitney dissent.

v.

UNITED STATES.

Federal succession tax — vested or contingent interest — refunding.

1. The interest of legatees in legacies paid over to them or to a trustee for them by the executor prior to July 1, 1902, although not demandable by them as of right until after that date, because the time for proving claims against the estate had not expired, had become absolutely vested in possession of such legatees prior to such date, within the meaning of the Act of June 27, 1902, providing for the refunding of taxes collected on contingent beneficial interests not vested prior to July 1, 1902, notwithstanding the remote possibility that the amounts so paid might have to be returned to the executor for payment of debts.

Federal succession tax — vested or contingent interest — refunding.

2. The interest in a fund transferred from an estate to a trustee for ascertained persons was vested in possession although they had received no income from it prior to July 1, 1902, within the provision of the Act of June 27, 1902, for the refunding of taxes collected on a contingent beneficial interest not vested prior to such date.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment disallowing a claim for the refunding of taxes paid on legacies. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 641.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Simon Lyon argued the cause, and, with Mr. R. B. H. Lyon, filed a brief for appellant:

No interest bequeathed by this will could be construed as having vested in absolute possession or enjoyment prior to July 1, 1902, but, to the contrary, they were all contingent and on that date refundable.

Solicitor General King argued the cause, and, with Mr. A. F. Myers, filed a brief for appellee:

The funds on which the taxes here in question have been assessed and collected were vested in possession or enjoyment prior to July 1, 1902.

Cl. 60; Deford v. United States, 52 Ct. Cl. 225.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit to recover taxes paid under the Spanish War Revenue Act of June 13, 1898, chap. 448, §§ 29, 30, 30 Stat. at L. 448, 464, 465, repealed by the Act of April 12, 1902, chap. 500, § 7, 32 Stat. at L. 96, 97, the repeal to take effect on July 1, 1902. By the Act of June 27, 1902, chap. 1160, § 3, 32 Stat.

at L. 406, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 232, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to refund taxes upon legacies collected upon contingent beneficial interests that should not have become vested before July 1, 1902, and this claim is made under the last-mentioned act. The claim was held by the court of [394] claims to be barred by the Statute of Limitations. In view of the decision in Sage v. United States, 250 U. S. 33, 63 L. ed. 828, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, it is admitted by the government that the judgment cannot be sustained on that ground, and therefore that matter need not be discussed; but it is contended that the judgment was right because the legacies taxed had become vested before July 1, 1902. Whether they had become vested within the meaning of the Refunding Act is the only question in the case.

The facts are these: Arthur Hendricks died domiciled in New York on March 5, 1902, and his will was proved on March 17, 1902. The claimant was executor and trustee under the will. By that instrument the sum of $50,000 was left to the claimant in trust for Florence Lester, for life, the remainder to go to the residue. The residue was left to the testator's five sisters. On July 1, 1902, the time for proving claims against the estate had not expired, but before that date the executor, having correctly estimated that a large sum would be left after all debts, paid over $135,780 to the five sisters in equal shares, and "established the trust fund" for Florence Lester; that is, as we understand the finding, transferred the sum of $50,000 to his separate account as trustee. The taxes in question were levied on these two amounts.

There is no doubt that if the claimant had retained the funds in his hands, as he had a legal right to do, the interest of the legatees would not have been vested in possession within the meaning of the statute, whatever the probabilities and however solvent the estate. United States v. Jones, 236 U. S. 106, 59 L. ed. 488, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 316; McCoach v. Pratt, 236 U. S. 562, 59 L. ed. 720, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 421. He contends that the same is true if he saw fit to pay over legacies before the time came when they could be demanded as of right. We will assume that, if the estate had proved insufficient, the executor not only would have been responsible, but could have recovered such portion of his payments as was needed to pay debts. [395] Still the consequence asserted does not follow. There can be no question that the interest of the sisters was held in possession, and so was that of the trustee, although he happened to be the same person as the executor. The interest was vested also in each case. The law uses familiar legal expressions in their familiar legal sense, and the distinction between a contingent interest and a vested interest subject to be devested is familiar to the law. Gray, Perpetuities, § 108. The remote possibility that the funds in the hands of the legatees might have to be returned no more prevented their being vested in possession and taxable than the possibility that a life estate might end at any moment prevented one that began before July 1, 1902, being taxed at its full value as fixed by the mortuary tables. United States v. Fidelity Trust Co. 222 U. S. 158, 160, 56 L. ed. 137, 141, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 59. In that case it was contended that the life estate was contingent so far as not actually enjoyed.

It is argued with regard to the trust for Florence Lester that the case stands differently, because the life tenant received no income from it before July 1, 1902. But for the purposes of this act the interest in a fund transferred from an estate to a trustee for ascertained persons is vested in possession no less than when it is conveyed directly to them. See United States v. Fidelity Trust Co., supra.

Carriers — right to cease operation of road.

2. A corporation carrying on a sawmill and lumber business, which has granted to the public an interest in a railroad operated in connection with its business by doing a small business as a common carrier thereon, may withdraw its grant by discontinuing the use of the road when such use can be kept up only at a loss.

[For other cases, see Carriers, III. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — compelling operation of railroad at a loss.

3. The operation at a loss of a railroad used in connection with a sawmill and lumber business on which a small amount of business as a common carrier has been done cannot be compelled by the court or state Railroad Commission on the ground that the owner had failed to petition the Commission for leave to discontinue the business of the railroad, as required by a local law, where the compulsory operation of the railroad would amount to a taking of property without due process of law.

Argued January 6, 1920. Decided February 2, 1920.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a judgment which reversed a judgment of the Twenty-second Judicial District of East Baton Rouge, holding void an order of the Louisiana Railroad Commission requiring the operation of a narrow-gauge railroad. Reversed.

See same case below, 144 La. 1086, P.U.R.1919E, 1, 81 So. 727.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Blanc Monroe and Robert R. Reid argued the cause, and, with Mr. Monte M. Lemann, filed a brief for petitioner:

A state railroad commission may not compel a railroad to operate at a loss.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by the Brooks-Scanlon Company, a Minnesota corporation organized to manufacture and deal in lumber and to carry on other incidental business, against the Railroad Commission of Louisiana. It seeks to set aside an order (Number 2228) of the Commission requiring the plaintiff, either directly or through arrangements made with the Kentwood & Eastern Railway Company, to operate its narrow-gauge railroad between Kentwood and Hackley, in Louisiana, upon schedules and days to be approved by the Commission. The plaintiff alleges that the order cannot be complied with except at a loss of more than $1,500 a month, and that to compel compliance would deprive the plaintiff of its property without due process of law, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, with other objections not necessary to be mentioned here. The defendant denies the plaintiff's allegations and in reconvention prays for an injunction against the tearing up or abandoning of the road, and for a mandate upholding the order. In the court of first instance a preliminary injunction was issued in favor of the Commission, but was dissolved upon bond. Subsequently a judgment was entered denying a motion of the Commission to set aside the order dissolving the injunction, and after a trial on the merits judgment was entered for the plaintiff, declaring the order void. The defendant appealed from both judgments to the supreme court of the state. That court reversed the decision below and reinstated the injunction granted on the defendant's prayer.

[398] It seems that the Banner Lumber Company, a Louisiana corporation, formerly owned timberlands, sawmills, and this narrow-gauge railroad. The road was primarily a logging road, but it may be assumed to have done business for third persons as a common carrier. The Banner Lumber Company sold the whole property to the Brooks-Scanlon Lumber Company on November 1, 1905, the stockholders of which obtained a charter for the railroad as the Kentwood & Eastern Railway Company on December 5 of the same year. In the interim it was managed by them with separate accounts. An oral lease of the road was made to the new company, and soon afterwards the Brooks-Scanlon Lumber Company transferred its property to the Brooks-Scanlon Company, the plaintiff in error. On the first of July, 1906, the Brooks-Scanlon Company made a written lease of the road to the railway company, and sold to it all the rolling stock and personal property used in connection with the road. Thereafter the road was run as before, doing a small business as a common carrier, but depending upon the carrying of logs and lumber to make it a profitable rather than a losing concern. In course of time the timber of the Brooks-Scanlon Company was cut and it terminated the lease to the railway company, which discontinued business on April 22, 1918, with the assent of the Railroad Commission, and sold its rolling stock. At that time the Commission, being advised that it had no power, did nothing more. But later, subsequent to a decision by the supreme court in May, it issued notice to the Brooks-Scanlon Company and the railway to show cause why the road should not be operated, gave a hearing, and issued the order complained of here. The supreme court, after saying that the two corporations were one under different names, stated that the only question left for determination was whether the plaintiff could be compelled by the Commission to operate [399] its railroad, and concluded that although the railroad showed a loss, the test of the plaintiff's rights was the net result of the whole enterprise,—the entire business of the corporation,—and on that ground made its decree.

We are of opinion that the test applied was wrong under the decisions of this court. A carrier cannot be compelled to carry on even a branch of business at a loss, much less the whole business of carriage. On this point it is enough to refer to Northern P. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 236 U. S. 585, 595, 599, 600, 604, 59 L. ed. 735, 741, 743-745, L.R.A.1917F, 1148, P.U.R.1915C, 277, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 429, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1, and Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. West Virginia, 236 U. S. 605, 609, 614, 59 L. ed. 745, 747, 749, P.U.R.1915C, 293, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437. It is true that if a railroad continues to exercise the power conferred upon it by a charter from a state, the state may require it to fulfil an obligation imposed by the charter, even though fulfilment in that particular may cause a loss. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 276, 278, 54 L. ed. 472, 478, 479, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 330. But that special rule is far from throwing any doubt upon a general principle too well established to need further argument here. The plaintiff may be making money from its sawmill and lumber business, but it no more can be compelled to spend that than it can be compelled to spend any other money to maintain a railroad for the benefit of others who do not care to pay for it. If the plaintiff be taken to have granted to the public an interest in the use of the railroad, it may withdraw its grant by discontinuing the use when that use can be kept up only at a loss. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 126, 24 L. ed. 77, 84. The principle is illustrated by the many cases in which the constitutionality of a rate is shown to depend upon whether it yields to the parties concerned a fair return.

While the decision below goes upon the ground that we have stated, it is thrown in at the end as a makeweight that the order of the Commission calls upon the plaintiff "to submit a new schedule for transportation which may be operated at much less expense to it than [400] the former schedule cost, and at a profit for plaintiff." This is merely the language of hope. We cannot take it to be a finding of fact, for we perceive nothing in the evidence that would warrant such a finding. The assumption upon which the court made its ruling was that the plaintiff's other business was successful enough to stand a loss on the road.

Finally a suggestion is made in argument that the decision rested also upon another ground that cannot be reconsidered here. At the end of the opinion it is stated that the plaintiff has not petitioned the Railroad Commission for leave to discontinue this business, and that until it has done so the courts are without jurisdiction of the matter. It is not impossible that this is an oversight, since it seems unlikely that after the Commission has called the plaintiff before it on the question, and, against its strenuous objection, has required it to go on, such an empty form can be required. But in any case it cannot be meant that the previous discussion, which occupies the whole body of the opinion, is superfluous and irrelevant to the result reached; nor can the words be taken literally, since the court proceeded to take jurisdiction and reinstated an injunction in favor of the defendant. Whatever may be the forms required by the local law, it cannot give the court or Commission power to do what the Constitution of the United States forbids, which is what the order and injunction attempt. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, November 10, 1919, 250 U. S. 566, 63 L. ed. 1142, P.U.R.1920A, 909, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36.

[401] BOARD OF PUBLIC UTILITY COMMISSIONERS, Petitioners,
v.
YNCHAUSTI & COMPANY et al.

Constitutional law — due process of law — taking property without compensation — regulating Philippine coastwise trade — free carriage of mails.

1. Neither the guaranty of the Philippine Bill of Rights of due process of law nor its prohibition against the taking of private property for public use without compensation can be said to have been violated by a Philippine law which imposed upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, for the privilege of so engaging, the duty to carry the mails free to and from their ports of touch, in view of the plenary power which the Philippine government had always possessed and exercised, and which was recognized in the Act of Congress of April 15, 1904, to limit the right to engage in the coastwise trade to those who agree to carry the mails free.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4; IV. v, 7, a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Congress — constitutional limitations upon power — insular possessions.

2. The constitutional limitations of power which operate upon the authority of Congress when legislating for the United States are inapplicable and do not control Congress when it comes to exert, in virtue of the sovereignty of the United States, legislative power over territory not forming a part of the United States, because not incorporated therein.

[For other cases, see Territories, II. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

lands to review a judgment which reversed an order of the Board of Public Utility Commissioners directing compliance with a law which imposed upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, for the privilege of so engaging, the duty to carry the mails free to and from their ports of touch. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Chester J. Gerkin argued the cause and filed a brief for petitioners:

The respondents having applied for and accepted licenses authorizing them to operate vessels in the Philippine coastwise trade subject to the law requiring them to carry mail without charge, in consideration of privileges and benefits accorded them by the government in granting them the right to engage in said business, have no cause for complaint regarding the conditions prescribed and obligations voluntarily assumed.

Cas. 555; 2 Wyman, Pub. Serv. Corp. p. 1151; Pullman Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 56, 66, 67, 54 L. ed. 378, 385, 386, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 232; Hamilton v. Dillin, 21 Wall. 73, 91, 22 L. ed. 528, 532.

A change of sovereignty does not affect existing municipal law.

Vilas v. Manila, 220 U. S. 345, 55 L. ed. 491, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416; Compañia General de Tabacos v. Alhambra Cigar & C. Mfg. Co. 249 U. S. 72, 75, 76, 63 L. ed. 484, 488, 489, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224.

If the present city of Manila is in every legal sense the successor of the old, and as such entitled to the property and rights of the predecessor corporation (Vilas v. Manila, 220 U. S. 345, 361, 55 L. ed. 491, 497, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416), the same is certainly true of the central government of the Philippine Islands (Philippine Islands v. Monte de Piedad, 35 Philippine, 728). A right of any validity before the cession is equally valid afterwards (Ely v. United States, 171 U. S. 220, 223, 43 L. ed. 142, 143, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 840).

Under Spanish law the seashore is the property of the state.

Ker v. Couden, 223 U. S. 268, 277, 56 L. ed. 432, 435, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 284.

The same legal doctrine obtains in this country.

Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 11, 38 L. ed. 331, 336, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548.

The government of the Philippine Islands possesses like plenary power over its coastwise trade as does Congress over the coastwise trade of the United States, —that is, complete control over this commerce. It may open and close ports to vessels at will; and may entirely exclude them from the privilege of carrying on this trade.

Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826; The William Bagaley, 5 Wall. 377, 409, 18 L. ed. 583, 590.

As no limitation has been imposed upon it in the premises, the Philippine legislature has the same power as Congress over the Philippine coastwise trade. The constitutional inhibitions regarding the deprivation of property rights apply equally to both lawmaking bodies.

The action of each and all of the coordinate departments of our government in dealing with the Philippine Islands clearly shows that it was not the intention to deprive the government of the latter of authority formerly exercised over its coastwise trade, or of the usual powers possessed by the Federal, state, and territorial governments respecting the granting of licenses to public service corporations.

Perez v. Fernandez, 202 U. S. 80, 50 L. ed. 942, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 561.

The carriage of the mails is a government monopoly in which no element of competition can enter; it is a function assumed and controlled by the state. There is no analogy between the transportation of mail and that of freight or passengers. The basis for the distinction made is obvious and fully justified. It has been held that a transportation company is not a common carrier in respect to such service when carrying mail—either as a duty imposed by a statute or under a contract with the government.

Was error committed by the court below in deciding that the Philippine law, which imposed upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, for the privilege of so engaging, the duty to carry the mails free to and from their ports of touch, was void for repugnancy to the Philippine Bill of Rights, is the question which comes before us for decision as the result of the allowance of a writ of certiorari.

The issue will be clarified by a brief reference to the antecedents of the controversy. Under the Spanish law as enforced in the Philippine Islands before the American domination the duty of free carriage as stated existed. Upon the cession of the Islands to the United States and the establishment there of a military government, the existing condition of the subject was continued in force. It thus continued until the government passed into the hands of the Philippine Commission and was by that body specifically recognized and its further enforcement directed. Thus it prevailed without interruption until 1902, when the first act of Congress, providing a general system of civil government for the Islands, was passed, and it further remained operative until 1904, when Congress passed the act of that year, specifically dealing with the authority of the Philippine government to provide for the coastwise trade, as follows (Act of April 15, 1904, 33 Stat. at L. 181, chap. 1314):

"Until Congress shall have authorized the registry as vessels of the United States of vessels owned in the Philippine Archipelago the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized to adopt, from time to time, and enforce regulations governing the transportation of merchandise and passengers between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago."

In fact, the continued operation of the obligation to [403] carry the mails free, which arose from engaging in the coastwise trade, it may be taken for granted, remained in force until 1916, since the obligation was recognized as being yet in existence and the duty to enforce it for the future was directed by article 310 of the Administrative Code of that year, in which Code were also stated the existing provisions as to the registry, licensing, etc., of Philippine vessels. That the requirement continued operative thereafter results from the further fact that it was re-expressed in § 658 of the Administrative Code of 1917, which Code was adopted to meet the exigencies created by the later Organic Act of the Philippine Islands, enacted by Congress August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. at L. 545, chap. 416, Comp. Stat. 3804a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 592).

We have not stopped to refer to the Spanish law, to the military orders, to the reports of civilian officials, and to the action of the Philippine Commission on the subject, as above stated, because the references to them were made below in Marginal Note A, which Mr. Justice Carson made a part of his dissenting opinion (— Philippine, —).

It is undoubted that during all this period vessels were permitted to engage in the coastwise trade only upon the issuance to and the acceptance by them of licenses the enjoyment of which depended upon the performance of the legal duty of the free carriage of the mails.

The respondents were in 1916 the owners of steam vessels of Philippine registry, licensed to engage in the coastwise trade upon the condition stated, and the controversy before us arose in consequence of a notice given by them to the Philippine director of posts that after a date designated they would no longer comply with the duty to carry the mails free. That official sought its enforcement at the hands of the Board of Public Utility Commissioners. Before that board the respondents, the licensees, relied upon the assertion that the section of the Administrative Code imposing the duty of free mail carriage was in conflict with the provisions of the Philippine Bill of Rights, [404] guaranteeing due process and prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. The board overruled the defense and awarded an order directing compliance with the law, and therefore prohibited the carrying out of the intention to discontinue. In reaching this conclusion the board held that its sole duty was to ascertain whether the law imposed the obligation to carry the mails free, and if it did, to enforce it without regard to the defense as to the repugnancy of the statute to the Bill of Rights, since that question was proper only to be disposed of by judicial action.

The supreme court, to which the controversy was taken, not differing as to the existence of the statutory duty, reversed the order on the ground that such duty could not be exacted consistently with the clauses of the Bill of Rights relied upon. No opinion stating the reasons for this conclusion was expressed, but a member of the court dissented and stated his reasons in an elaborate opinion.

It is impossible to conceive how either the guaranty by the Bill of Rights of due process, or its prohibition against the taking of private property for public use without compensation, can have the slightest application to the case if the Philippine government possessed the plenary power, under the sanction of Congress, to limit the right to engage in the coastwise trade to those who agree to carry the mails free. It must follow that the existence of such power is the real question which is required to be decided. In saying this we put out of view as obviously erroneous the contention that, even though the Bill of Rights applied and limited the authority of the government so as to prevent the exaction by law of the free carriage of the mails, that result is not applicable here, because, by accepting a license, the shipowners voluntarily assumed the obligation of free carriage. Southern P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 207, 36 L. ed. 943, 945, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 27-30, 54 L. ed. 355, 366, 367, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190; Pullman Co. v. [405] Kansas, 216 U. S. 56, 70, 54 L. ed. 378, 387, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 232; Meyer v. Wells, F. & Co. 223 U. S. 298, 300, 301, 56 L. ed. 445, 447, 448, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 218; Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Botkin, 240 U. S. 227, 233, 234, 60 L. ed. 617, 619, 620, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Foster, 247 U. S. 105, 114, 62 L. ed. 1006, 1016, 1 A.L.R. 1278, P.U.R.1918D, 865, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 438.

To what extent the Bill of Rights limits the authority of the government of the Philippine Islands over the subject of the free carriage of the mails is, then, the determinative factor. Beyond doubt Congress, in providing a Bill of Rights for those Islands, intended its provisions to have there the settled construction they have received in the United States. But it must be and is indisputable that when the provisions of such Bill come to be applied to governmental powers in the Philippine Islands, the result of their application must depend upon the nature and character of the powers conferred by Congress upon the government of the Islands. To illustrate: where a particular activity in the Philippine Islands is, as the result of power conferred by Congress, under governmental control to such an extent that the right to engage in it can be made by the Philippine government dependent upon the performance of a particular duty, it is obvious that the exaction of such a duty, as such prerequisite condition, can be neither a denial of due process nor a taking of property without compensation.

Coming to the proposition to which the case is therefore ultimately reduced, we see no reason to doubt that the Philippine government had the power to deal with the coastwise trade so as to permit its enjoyment only by those who were willing to comply with the condition as to free mail carriage; and therefore that no violation of individual right could have resulted from giving effect to such condition. We reach this conclusion because the possession and exercise of such power in the Islands before their cession to the United States, its exertion under the military government of the United States which followed the cession, and its continuance by every form of civil [406] government created by Congress for the Islands, compel to that view in the absence of any law expressly providing to the contrary, or which, by reasonable implication, leads to that result.

Indeed, the conclusion that the power was possessed does not rest alone upon the general consideration stated, since it is additionally sustained by recalling the express provision of the Act of Congress of 1904, to which we have previously referred, giving authority for the registry of Philippine vessels, and recognizing the power of the government of the Philippine Islands to deal with the coastwise trade,—an authority which, as it contains no provision tending to the contrary, must be construed as applicable to and sanctioning the power which had been exerted from the very inception of the American domination, to provide as to that trade for the free carriage of the mails. In other words, in view of the power to impose the burden in question, exerted in the Philippine Islands from the beginning, and which was then being exerted under the authority of Congress, the conferring by Congress upon the Philippine government by the Act of 1904 of the authority to make regulations concerning such trade was a recognition of the right to make the regulation theretofore made, which was then in force, and which continued to be in force up to the time of the bringing of this suit, without disapproval or change by Congress.

When the authority which the Act of 1904 gave is borne in mind, it makes it clear that the mistake which underlies the entire argument as to the nonexistence of power here relied upon arises from the erroneous assumption that the constitutional limitations of power which operate upon the authority of Congress when legislating for the United States are applicable and are controlling upon Congress when it comes to exert, in virtue of the sovereignty of the United States, legislative power over territory not forming part of the United States, because not [407] incorporated therein. United States, 234 U. S. 91, 98, 58 L. ed. 1231, 1234, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 712.

The error which thus underlies the whole argument becomes more conspicuously manifest by recalling that Congress, in the Act of 1904, expressly provided that the authority which that act gave should exist only until Congress should otherwise provide; and, besides, that before the passage of that act, the Act of July 1, 1902, § 86 (32 Stat. at L. 691, 712, chap. 1369, Comp. Stat. § 3804, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 1133, 1150), provided "that all laws passed by the government of the Philippine Islands shall be reported to Congress, which hereby reserves the power and authority to annul the same."

JOSIAH V. THOMPSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 407–417.)

Appeal — review by government in criminal case — order quashing indictment.

1. A ruling taking the form of a grant of a motion to quash an indictment on the ground that the charges, having been submitted to a previous grand jury which failed to indict, were resubmitted to a later grand jury by the Federal district attorney without leave of court first obtained, is a "decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy," within the meaning of the Criminal Appeals Act

---

Note.—On appellate review by government in criminal case—see notes to United States v. Comyns, 63 L. ed. U. S. 287; United States v. New South Farm & Home Co. 60 L. ed. U. S. 890; and United States v. Stevenson, 54 L. ed. U. S. 153.

Right of grand jury to reconsider, or district attorney to resubmit, a charge that has once been acted upon by the grand jury and "not a true bill" found.

It is a generally accepted principle, in the absence of a contrary statutory rule, that the fact that a grand jury has once investigated an alleged offense and refused to indict therefor does not invalidate an indictment for the same offense, subsequently returned by the same or a subsequent grand jury. United States v. Martin, 50 Fed. 918; State v. Green, 111 Mo. 585, 20 S. W. 304; Fitch v. State, 18 S. C. L. (2 Nott. & M'C.) 558.

The fact that a grand jury which had voted not to find a bill against the accused, afterwards reconsidered its determination and voted to find the bill of March 2, 1907, granting the government a right to review in a criminal case.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, I. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Grand jury — powers — exhausting by failure to act.

2. The power and duty of the grand jury to investigate is original and complete, susceptible of exercise upon its own motion, and upon such knowledge as it may derive from any source which it may deem proper, and is not, therefore, dependent for its exertion upon the approval or disapproval of the court, and such power is continuous, and is therefore not exhausted or limited by adverse action taken by a grand jury or by its failure to act, and hence may thereafter be exerted as to the same instances by the same or a subsequent grand jury.
[For other cases, see Grand Jury, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

District attorney — powers — presenting charges without leave of court.

3. The United States district attorney, in virtue of his official duty, and to the extent that criminal charges are susceptible of being preferred by information, has the power to present such informations without the previous approval of the court, and his duty to direct the attention of the grand jury to crimes which he thinks have been committed is coterminous with the authority of the grand jury to entertain such charges.

without, so far as appears, any new evidence being presented, furnishes no ground for quashing the indictment. United States v. Simmons, 46 Fed. 65.

It is stated in Knott v. Sargent, 125 Mass. 95, that the mere return of "no bill" by the grand jury does not operate as a legal discharge of the accused, and does not necessarily import that the same or a subsequent grand jury may not find a bill upon the same complaint. It appears, however, in this case, that because of the absence of material witnesses, the charge against the accused was not acted upon, but was continued or postponed.

But it has been held that a grand jury which has returned a bill with the indorsement "not a true bill," of which finding a record is made, cannot have the bill returned to it for reconsideration, and by striking out the word "not" make of such bill a valid indictment. State v. Brown, 81 N. C. 568. It is stated in this case that in every such instance a new bill should be sent, and it is assumed that the grand jury has autnority to reconsider its action and return a new bill. In the subsequent case of State v. Harris, 91 N. C. 656, it is expressly held that after a bill has been "ignored" by a grand jury, a new bill may be sent for the same offense and before the same grand jury, and additional evidence laid before the grand jury to support it, upon which the grand jury may return a true bill. The holding in State v. Harris corresponds with an obiter statement in State v. Branch, 68 N. C. 186, 12 Am. Rep. 633. There is, however, the qualification in the statement of State v. Branch, that the state solicitor, upon a suggestion to the court that he has procured further evidence, may be allowed to send another bill to the same grand jury, charging the same offense, thus making the consent of the court necessary to a resubmission.

And see the Pennsylvania cases, infra.

In England it has been held that if the grand jury ignores a bill, it cannot find another bill against the same person, for the same offense, at the same assizes or sessions. Reg. v. Humphreys, Car. & M. 601; Reg. v. Austin, 4 Cox, C. C. 385. On the contrary, it has been held in that jurisdiction that a grand jury which has ignored a bill may find another for the same offense. Reg. v. Simmonite, 1 Cox, C. C. 30; Reg. v. Newton, 2 Moody & R. 503. The court in Reg. v. Simmonite states that though some inconvenience may arise by permitting a grand jury which has ignored one bill to find another for the same offense, there is no objection in principle to its being done; that it is clear another bill might be sent to another grand jury, and there is no reason why it should not be sent before the same.

By statute in some states a dismissal of a charge by the grand jury is a bar to any subsequent prosecution.

In Georgia the finding of "no bills" by grand juries at two several terms is a bar. The Code provision that two "no bills" shall be a "bar to another indictment unless they have been procured by the fraudulent conduct of the person charged, on proof of which or of newly discovered evidence the judge may allow a third bill to be presented, found, and prosecuted," does not entitle the person charged to an order that he be discharged from the offense or crime therein contained, and go hence without bail, since such an order would, perhaps, if granted, bar a third indictment, even under the conditions provided for. Christmas v. State, 53 Ga. 81.

The highest evidence of the action of the grand jury in such a matter is the return of a "no bill," entered upon the District attorney — second presentation of charge to grand jury — leave of court.

4. A Federal district attorney may, without first obtaining leave of court, present to one grand jury charges which a previous grand jury has ignored.

[For other cases, see District Attorney, III. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Federal courts — rules of procedure — criminal prosecution — state practice.

5. A state rule of law which forbids a district attorney, without first obtaining leave of court, to present to one grand jury charges which a previous grand jury has ignored, can have no application by virtue of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 722, to a prosecution in the Federal courts for a crime against the United States, committed within such state, in view of the existence of a controlling Federal rule which would be overthrown by applying the state rule.

court's minutes; but in the absence of this degree of proof resort may be had to other competent testimony. Individual grand jurors having knowledge of the facts are competent witnesses to testify that a bill or presentment had been preferred, voted upon, and returned, "not proved." Elliott v. State, 1 Ga. App. 113, 57 S. E. 972.

A statute governing the resubmission of a charge to the same or another grand jury after a demurrer is sustained to an indictment, which provides that in case the next grand jury fails to find a new indictment, the accused shall be discharged, does not make the failure of the next grand jury to indict a bar to further prosecution; an indictment returned by the fourth succeeding grand jury is sufficient. Ex parte Job, 17 Nev. 184, 38 Pac. 699.

But an indictment returned by a grand jury after it had made a report of "no true bill" was held voidable in State v. Towers, 37 Nev. 94, 139 Pac. 776, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 269, although the charge was ordered resubmitted by the court.

The necessity of an order of court to authorize a consideration of an offense which had once been investigated and no indictment found has not been considered in many cases. The necessity of an order of court raises two questions: (1) The right of the grand jury on its own motion to consider an offense which has once been investigated and no indictment found; and (2) the right of the district or prosecuting attorney to again submit the matter for consideration.

A statute providing that the dismissal by a grand jury of a charge does not prevent it being again submitted to the grand jury as often as the court may direct, but without such direction it cannot again be submitted, does not, according to some courts, prevent the grand jury on its own motion considering a charge that has once been dismissed. This has been held where the grand jury which returned the indictment was the same jury which had previously dismissed the charge (Marshall v. State, 84 Ark. 88, 104 S. W. 934), and also where the indictment was returned by a grand jury subsequent to the jury which investigated and dismissed the charge (State v. Collis, 73 Iowa, 542, 35 N. W. 625; State v. Brown, 128 Iowa, 24, 102 N. W. 799).

The reasoning by which the courts have reached this conclusion is well expressed by the supreme court of Iowa, in State v. Collis, supra, in language which is approved by the supreme court of Arkansas in Marshall v. State, 84 Ark. 88, 104 S. W. 934, as follows: "The question in the case is whether the last clause of the section prohibits the grand jury from finding an indictment on a charge which has once been dismissed, but which has not been resubmitted to it by the court. We think it does not. The provision relates merely to the matter of the submission of such causes to the grand jury. After they have been once dismissed they can be resubmitted only by direction of the court; that is, the court can require the grand jury to again investigate the charge only by directing it to be resubmitted. But the power of the grand jury in the premises is not dependent upon the order or direction of the court; its powers and duties are prescribed by other provisions of statute." The Iowa court then refers to the duty of the grand jury to make diligent inquiry and prove presentment of all public offenses committed or triable within the county of which they have or can obtain legal evidence, and states that having been submitted to a previous grand jury which failed to indict, were resubmitted to another grand jury by the Federal district attorney without leave of court first obtained. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. C. Herron argued the cause, and, with Assistant Attorney General Stewart and Solicitor General King, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The name given to a pleading does not determine its true character under the Act of March 2, 1907.

United States v. Barber, 219 U. S. 72, 78, 55 L. ed. 99, 101, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep 209.

Of course, the quashing of a bad indictment is no bar to a prosecution upon a good one, but a judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the prosecution is barred goes to his liability as matter of substantive law, and one judgment that he is free as matter of substantive law is as good as another.

Neither the Iowa nor the Arkansas courts referred the limitation of power contained in the statute to a restriction of the authority of the district attorney. Unless the restriction was meant to apply to the district attorney, it is difficult to give the statute any effect at all. According to these decisions it is no restriction or limitation upon the authority of the grand jury, nor is it a limitation upon the authority of the court. Both the Iowa and Arkansas courts assume that the court has authority and power to submit the cause as often as it desires. Unless, therefore, as above stated, the limitation is upon the authority of the district attorney, the statute is rendered of no effect.

Not all courts agree with the above construction of such a statute. The Kentucky court in Sutton v. Com. 97 Ky. 308, 30 S. W. 661, expresses an obiter opinion contrary to the holding of the Iowa and Arkansas courts, under an identical statute.

In the Kentucky case a joint indictment had been returned against two persons; one of the persons moved to set aside the indictment upon the ground that although he was held by an examining court to answer to the charge before a stated grand jury, there had been two terms of court at which grand juries were summoned and impaneled before an indictment was found against him, and that there was no order of court submitting the charge to the grand jury that did find the indictment; this motion was sustained and the person discharged from custody. The other person indicted stood trial and the jury disagreed; subsequently he was convicted, and after this made a motion to set aside the indictment for the same reason the indictment of the person jointly charged with him was dismissed. The court states that the failure of the grand juries to find an indictment against the accused was equivalent to a direct refusal to indict, and that, as two terms of court had intervened before the indictment under which the appellant was convicted had been found, and it was then done without direction of the court, it should have been set aside upon proper motion, but that the appellant waived his right to have it set aside by standing trial.

Under a statutory provision that if the grand jurors shall not concur in finding an indictment or presentment, the charge shall be dismissed, "but such dismissal shall not prevent its being again submitted to a grand jury as often as the court shall direct," it is stated in State v. Young, 113 Minn. 96, 129 N. W. 148, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 163, that a report to the court of no indictment found, in a matter which had been regularly submitted to and considered by the grand jury, is a complete termination of the authority of the jury in respect to the particular charge so reported upon; that the matter of resubmission rests with the court. It was held in this case that a petition charging that the grand jury failed to give proper consideration to certain charges before them was not a contempt when filed after the final report of the grand jury, for the reason that its authority had then been terminated.

The court has authority under these statutes to refer the charge to a subsequent grand jury and issue a warrant for the arrest of the accused. Monroe v. Berry, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 602, 94 S. W. 38.

It has been held that the power of the court to permit charges again to be submitted to a grand jury should be sparingly and discriminatingly used; that a resubmission of such charges will not be ordered where the district attorney was of the opinion that the grand jury which dismissed the charges misun-

The grand jury is an independent body; charged merely with the duty of investigating and presenting all violations of law supposed to have happened within its jurisdiction.

The fundamental power of the grand jury to make presentments or indictments in regard to alleged violations of law brought to their attention through proper channels not soiled by malice, bias, or mere suspicion is not subject to a power in the court of rejection of such presentments or indictments.

derstood the law, and that if the charge were again submitted, an indictment might be found, and where, so far as appears, the evidence against the persons against whom indictments were sought was fully brought to the attention of the grand jury. People v. Neidhart, 35 Misc. 191, 71 N. Y. Supp. 591.

There is very little authority upon the right of the district attorney to resubmit a bill. See State v. Branch, 68 N. C. 186, 12 Am. Rep. 633, supra. In Pennsylvania a bill once dismissed by a grand jury cannot be resubmitted to the same or a subsequent grand jury without leave of court. This proposition was established in Rowand v. Com. 82 Pa. 405 (see infra for facts. See cases infra in which leave of court was granted, and in which this was assumed to be necessary). But a subsequent prosecution may be begun as an original matter and submitted to a subsequent grand jury without leave of court first obtained. In such a case the indictment will not be quashed. The distinction between reconsidering a bill once dismissed and beginning a new prosecution is very clearly stated in Com. v. Snyder, 13 Pa. Dist. R. 27. In that case an indictment was returned by the grand jury ignored to a subsequent grand jury. On another complaint charging the defendant with what was alleged to be the same offense, an indictment was returned. A motion to quash the indictment was filed for the reason that the offense was the same as that contained in the charge which was ignored by the former grand jury, and that no special leave was granted for its presentment to the subsequent grand jury. The court states: "There seems to me to be quite a distinction between the sending of a bill based upon the same complaint, the second time, to the same grand jury, after it has been ignored by them, and an original prosecution for the same offense returned to another grand jury at another session. In the first instance the complaint is dead, unless the court sees fit to revive it by permitting the case to be again sent to the same or a subsequent grand jury. In the latter case the prosecutor makes a new complaint, and the case comes again into the court to be passed upon, the prosecutor being liable, however, to answer in an action for malicious prosecution, in case it is ascertained that he acted maliciously and without probable cause in making the second complaint." The court then refers to the difficulty of ascertaining whether the offenses charged in the two instances are the same, and states that for this reason the motion to quash should be refused; but adds that the decision is based upon the broader ground that the court has no right to quash an indictment brought under such circumstances, upon a new complaint, for any such reason.

In Com. v. Whitaker, 25 Pa. Co. Ct. 42, where the court refused to resubmit a bill which had once been dismissed by the grand jury, it is stated that the prosecutor, if he deems himself aggrieved, has his remedy by instituting a prosecution de novo.

The court has discretion to permit the district attorney to submit a new bill after the first indictment has been ignored. Com. v. Stoner, 70 Pa. Super. Ct. 365; Com. v. Leigh, 38 Phila. Leg. Int. 184. But the court will recommit a bill which has once been ignored only in urgent cases. Com. v. Whitaker, supra.

The court in Com. v. Allen, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 546, refused, upon the application of private counsel, to recommit a bill which had been ignored by a previous grand jury where there was no allegation or proof that the bill was ignored in consequence of oversight, mistake, or fraud, or improper action on the part of the grand jury, the court stating that, under these circumstances, there is no such grave emergency or urgent public necessity as justifies the court in the action desired.

In Com. v. Priestly, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. 543, the court refused to resubmit a bill upon the motion of private counsel in the absence of any allegation of irregularity, oversight, mistake, or fraud.

As stated above, the Pennsylvania doctrine was established by the court in Rowan v. Com. supra. Relief was, however, denied to the accused in that case. Here charges were investigated by a grand jury which ignored the same, and ordered the county to pay costs. At a subsequent grand jury new bills, precisely like the former ones, based upon the same information, which were held to be substantially the same as returning the old ignored bills to be reconsidered by the new grand jury, were submitted and indictments found. Upon a motion to quash the indictments the trial court expressed grave doubt as to the legality of the proceeding, and emphatically condemned the practice which sustained it, but overruled the motion to quash. Upon appeal to the supreme court, that court states that "where a defendant has been once discharged on a return of 'ignoramus,' a new bill sent up without a fresh hearing and without the leave of the court should be promptly quashed in the absence of affirmative proof that the course taken was required to meet some grave emergency, or to provide for some urgent public need." But it is held that the trial court must be assumed to have approved the action of the district attorney; that, the defendant having been tried, convicted, and sentenced on the bills sent to the second grand jury, if there was a wrong, it was one which the trial court could alone redress, and that the supreme court was powerless to interpose.

United States v. Mason, 213 U. S. 115, 53 L. ed. 725, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 480.

The essential nature of a plea in bar, such as a plea of the Statute of Limitations, is not changed by designating it a plea in abatement, and such designation does not defeat an appeal by the United States under this act.

Byrne, Fed. Crim. Proc. 223; United States v. Barber, 219 U. S. 72, 55 L. ed. 99, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209.

Dilatory pleas are such as delay the plaintiff's remedy, by questioning, not the cause of action, but the propriety of the suit, or the mode in which the remedy is sought.

2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 9th ed. p. 342.

Peremptory pleas are in bar of the action.

2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 9th ed. p. 340; Stephen, Pl. 63; 1 Chitty, Pl. 425; Lawes, Pl. 36.

A plea in abatement belongs to the dilatory class.

2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 9th ed. pp. 340, 341; Stephen Pl. 70, 71; Black's Law Dict. 2d ed. 903; 1 Standard Proc. p. 38.

Special pleas in bar are those which go to the merits of the indictment, and give a reason why the prisoner ought not to answer it at all, nor put himself upon his trial for the crime alleged.

4 Bl. Com. 334.

The defendant's motion to quash the indictment was, strictly speaking, neither a plea in bar nor a plea in abatement.

Agnew v. United States, 165 U. S. 36, 41 L. ed. 624, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 235; United States v. Gale, 109 U. S. 65, 27 L. ed. 857, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; United States v. Celestine, 215 U. S. 278, 54 L. ed. 195, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 93; United States v. Barber, 219 U. S. 72, 55 L. ed. 99, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209; 12 Cyc. 348.

To now urge in the Supreme Court that defendant's motion was a special plea in bar—one that not only strikes down the present indictment, but as well destroys the action itself and bars all other and future indictments—is to abandon and reject the position taken in the trial court.

United States v. George, 228 U. S. 14, 57 L. ed. 712, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 412.

Federal courts will follow and be governed by the practice of state courts in matters not otherwise provided for in Federal procedure, where the same is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. The order or judgment of the court below in quashing the indictment in question was entirely in keeping with the general rule of law, and particularly with the practice in such matters in the Pennsylvania courts, wherein the exercise of such supervisory power is recognized as a justifiable and proper act of judicial discretion.

Monopoly — steel trust — intent — past practices — dissolution — public interest.

4. A holding corporation which by its formation united under one control competing companies in the steel industry, but which did not achieve monopoly, and only attempted to fix prices through occasional appeals to and confederation with competitors, whatever there was of wrongful intent not having been executed, and whatever there was of evil effect having been discontinued before suit was brought, should not be dissolved nor be separated from some of its subsidiaries at the suit of the government, asserting violations of the Sherman Anti-trust Act,—especially where the court cannot see that the public interest will be served by yielding to the government's demand, and does see in so yielding a risk of injury to the public interest, including a material disturbance of, and, perhaps, serious detriment to, the foreign trade.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey to review a decree dismissing the bill in a suit to dissolve the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries. Affirmed.

See same case below, 223 Fed. 55.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Assistant to the Attorney General Todd, Special Assistant to the Attorney General Colton, and Solicitor General Davis, argued the cause on original argument, and, with Attorney General Gregory and Mr. Robert Szold, filed a brief for appellant:

It has never been doubted that combinations of this type, embracing a dominant proportion of those engaged in a particular industry, and formed for the express purpose of suppressing competition between them, are combinations in restraint of trade.

Nor is it material, their purpose and effect being what they were, that the combinations here assailed were created in corporate form instead of by loose agreement.

Congress rightly believed that the advantages of large business units, in so far as they are real and substantial, would inevitably assert themselves by normal growth. It closed the short cut to those advantages—monopolistic combination—because danger lies that way. If there is evil in this, it is accepted as less than that which may result from the unification of interest, and the power such unification gives.

Congress rightly believed that the advantages of large business units, in so far as they are real and substantial, would inevitably assert themselves by normal growth. It closed the short cut to those advantages—monopolistic combination—because danger lies that way. If there is evil in this, it is accepted as less than that which may result from the unification of interest, and the power such unification gives.

National Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas, 197 U. S. 115, 129, 49 L. ed. 689, 694, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379.

Competition is worth more to society than it costs.

corporation as an alleged violator of the Sherman Anti-trust Act, should consider, not what the corporation had power to do or did, but what it now has power to do and is doing.

[For other cases, see Monopoly, II. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Monopoly — under Anti-trust Act — expectation or realization.

2. The Sherman Anti-trust Act is directed against monopoly; not against an expectation of it, but against its realization.

[For other cases, see Monopoly, II. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Monopoly — under Anti-trust Act — size of corporation — unexerted powers.

3. The mere size of a corporation, or the existence of unexerted power unlawfully to restrain competition, does not of itself make such a corporation a violator of the Sherman Anti-trust Act.

[For other cases, see Monopoly, II. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Monopoly — steel trust — intent — past practices — dissolution — public interest.

4. A holding corporation which by its formation united under one control competing companies in the steel industry, but which did not achieve monopoly, and only attempted to fix prices through occasional appeals to and confederation with competitors, whatever there was of wrongful intent not having been executed, and whatever there was of evil effect having been discontinued before suit was brought, should not be dissolved nor be separated from some of its subsidiaries at the suit of the government, asserting violations of the Sherman Anti-trust Act,—especially where the court cannot see that the public interest will be served by yielding to the government's demand, and does see in so yielding a risk of injury to the public interest, including a material disturbance of, and, perhaps, serious detriment to, the foreign trade.

Argued March 9, 12, 13, and 14, 1917. Restored to docket May 21, 1917. Reargued October 7, 8, 9, and 10, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey to review a decree dismissing the bill in a suit to dissolve the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries. Affirmed.

See same case below, 223 Fed. 55.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Assistant to the Attorney General Todd, Special Assistant to the Attorney General Colton, and Solicitor General Davis, argued the cause on original argument, and, with Attorney General Gregory and Mr. Robert Szold, filed a brief for appellant:

It has never been doubted that combinations of this type, embracing a dominant proportion of those engaged in a particular industry, and formed for the express purpose of suppressing competition between them, are combinations in restraint of trade.

Nor is it material, their purpose and effect being what they were, that the combinations here assailed were created in corporate form instead of by loose agreement.

Indeed, where, as here, corporations simply exchange their plants and businesses for stock in a consolidated corporation, the resulting combination is in no respect different in principle from a combination in the form of trust which the statute specifically prohibits.

No more powerful instrument of monopoly could be used, said Mr. Justice Holmes, in Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 402, 49 L. ed. 518, 527, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 276, than an advantage in the cost of transportation.

The union of so many previously independent business units, about 130, with such vast aggregate resources, $1,800,000,000, controlling so great a proportion of the entire industry, approximately half, with the next largest competitor controlling less than 6 per cent, are factors from which this court has repeatedly inferred the existence of a specific intent to suppress competition.

Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 106, 35 L.R.A. 722, 44 N. E. 1077.

Furthermore, even if it would have been lawful for the many independent businesses combined through this holding company to unite to some extent to develop foreign trade (by joint selling agencies, for example), that cannot justify the complete and permanent suppression of competition between them in domestic trade.

In order to vitiate a contract or combination, it is not essential that its result should be a complete monopoly; it is sufficient if it really tends to that end, and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from free competition.

United States v. E. C. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, 16, 39 L. ed. 325, 330, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249; Chesapeake & O. Fuel Co. v. United States, 53 C. C. A. 256, 115 Fed. 610.

The test of the legality of a combination is not its present effect upon prices, wages, etc., nor its present conduct toward the remaining competitors, but its effect upon competition. If its effect is unduly to restrict competition, then it is immaterial that, for the time being, the combination may exercise its power benevolently.

Messrs. Richard V. Lindabury, David A. Reed, and Cordenio A. Severance argued the cause, and, with Mr. Raynal C. Bolling, filed a brief for appellees on original argument:

As to the meaning of the terms "monopolize" and "restraint of trade," as used in the Anti-trust Act, see 2 Hoar, Autobiography of Seventy Years, p. 364; United States v. Du Pont De Nemours, 188 Fed. 150; United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. Competition depends not upon the manufacture of common products, but upon the extent of their sale in common territory.

Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96.

The mere combination of manufacturing concerns not in competition with each other is not a violation of the Anti-trust Act, no matter how large their percentage of the country's production may be.

United States v. Winslow, 227 U. S. 202, 217, 57 L. ed. 481, 485, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253.

It cannot in reason be said that a combination of manufacturing concerns whose competition did not exceed that shown in this case, whose percentage of the production did not exceed 50.1, and whose acquisition of a raw material supply did not exceed its reasonable requirements, and did not approach to a monopoly, must necessarily have operated to restrain trade, or, in and of itself, must necessarily have amounted to a monopoly or an attempt at monopolization.

Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 49 L. ed. 518, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 276; United States v. Standard Oil Co. 173 Fed. 183, 221 U. S. 75, 55 L. ed. 650, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734; United States v. American Tobacco Co. 164 Fed. 719, 221 U. S. 157, 55 L. ed. 685, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632; United States v.

Reading Co. 226 U. S. 324, 370, 57 L. ed. 243, 259, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 90.

If the corporation was organized for legitimate business purposes and without intent to monopolize, then, even if it had power to monopolize (which the evidence in this case shows it has not), still, the mere incidental acquisition of such power constitutes no threat or offense under the Anti-trust Act.

Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 55 L. ed. 619, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734; United States v. Terminal R. Asso. 224 U. S. 383, 56 L. ed. 810, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507.

The law is not concerned with competition as such, but with the injury to the public resulting either from artificially stimulating or unduly limiting or suppressing competition. In other words, it was the intent of Congress in enacting the Anti-trust Act to require that business should be conducted along normal lines, with full opportunity for the play of competitive forces. When this situation exists, all of the public, whether producers, traders, or consumers, are protected. The evils legislated against may be brought about:

(a) By a voluntary combination embracing a sufficient number of otherwise competing concerns to enable the parties to the same to interrupt the usual operation of the law of supply and demand by controlling prices or production, thus unduly limiting or suppressing competition, as in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96; Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 49 L. ed. 518, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 276; Shawnee Compress Co. v. Anderson, 209 U. S. 423, 52 L. ed. 865, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 572; Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Louis Voight & Sons Co. 212 U. S. 227, 53 L. ed. 486, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280; Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20, 57 L. ed. 107, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9; United States v. Union P. R. Co. 226 U. S. 61, 57 L. ed. 124, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 53; United States v. Reading Co. 226 U. S. 324, 57 L. ed. 243, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 90; or

(b) By a combination which carries on what Mr. Justice Holmes, in his dissenting opinion in the Northern Securities Case, terms "the ferocious extreme of competition," through which rivals are kept out of business, and those already in are driven out; as in Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 55 L. ed. 619, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734; United States v. American Tobacco Co. 221 U. S. 106, 55 L. ed. 663, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632,—the combination thus drawing to itself, by excluding others, a monopolistic power over prices and production, and in that way unduly limiting competition, and thus thwarting the usual operation of the law of supply and demand; or

(c) Through the enforcement of a boycott by a combination which is attended by the same results, as in W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307; Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, 52 L. ed. 488, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, 13 Ann. Cas. 815; Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Asso. v. United States, 234 U. S. 600, 58 L. ed. 1490, L.R.A.1915A, 788, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 951.

Assistant to the Attorney General Ames and Special Assistant to the Attorney General Colton for appellant on reargument.

Messrs. Richard V. Lindabury, David A. Reed, Cordenio A. Severance, and George Welwood Murray for appellees.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit against the Steel Corporation and certain other companies which it directs and controls by reason of the ownership of their stock, it and they being separately and collectively charged as violators of the Sherman Anti-trust Act [Act of July 2, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, Comp. Stat. § 8820, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 644].

It is prayed that it and they be dissolved because engaged in illegal restraint of trade and the exercise of monopoly.

Special charges of illegality and monopoly are made and special redresses and remedies are prayed; among others, that there be a prohibition of stock ownership and exercise [437] of rights under such ownership and that there shall be such orders and distribution of the stock and other properties as shall be in accordance with equity and good conscience, and "shall effectuate the purpose of the Anti-trust Act." General relief is also prayed.

The Steel Corporation is a holding company only; the other companies are the operating ones, manufacturers in the iron and steel industry, twelve in number. There are, besides, other corporations and individuals more or less connected in the activities of the other defendants that are alleged to be instruments or accomplices in their activities and offendings; and that these activities and offendings (speaking in general terms) extend from 1901 to 1911, when the bill was filed, and have illustrative periods of significant and demonstrated illegality.

Issue is taken upon all these charges, and we see at a glance what detail of circumstances may be demanded, and we may find ourselves puzzled to compress them into an opinion that will not be of fatiguing prolixity.

The case was heard in the district court by four judges. They agreed that the bill should be dismissed; they disagreed as to the reasons for it. 223 Fed. 55. One opinion (written by Judge Buffington and concurred in by Judge McPherson) expressed the view that the Steel Corporation was not formed with the intention or purpose to monopolize or restrain trade, and did not have the motive or effect "to prejudice the public interest by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the course of trade." The corporation, in the view of the opinion, was an evolution, a natural consummation of the tendencies of the industry on account of changing conditions,—practically a compulsion from "the metallurgical method of making steel and the physical method of handling it,"—this method, and the conditions consequent upon it, tending to combinations of capital and energies rather than diffusion in independent action. And the [438] concentration of powers (we are still representing the opinion) was only such as was deemed necessary, and immediately manifested itself in improved methods and products and in an increase of domestic and foreign trade. Indeed, an important purpose of the organization of the corporation was the building up of the export trade in steel and iron, which at that time was sporadic,—the mere dumping of the products upon foreign markets.

Not monopoly, therefore, was the purpose of the organization of the corporation, but concentration of efforts with resultant economies and benefits.

The tendency of the industry and the purpose of the corporation in yielding to it was expressed in comprehensive condensation by the word "integration," which signifies continuity in the processes of the industry from ore mines to the finished product.

All considerations deemed pertinent were expressed and their influence was attempted to be assigned; and, while conceding that the Steel Corporation, after its formation in times of financial disturbance, entered into informal agreements or understandings with its competitors to maintain prices, they terminated with their occasions, and, as they had ceased to exist, the court was not justified in dissolving the corporation.

The other opinion (by Judge Woolley, and concurred in by Judge Hunt, 223 Fed. 161) was, in some particulars, in antithesis to Judge Buffington's. The view was expressed that neither the Steel Corporation nor the preceding combinations, which were in a sense its antetypes, had the justification of industrial conditions, nor were they or it impelled by the necessity for integration, or compelled to unite in comprehensive enterprise because such had become a condition of success under the new order of things. On the contrary, that the organizers of the corporation and the preceding companies had illegal purpose from the very beginning, and the corporation [439] became "a combination of combinations by which, directly or indirectly, approximately 180 independent concerns were brought under one business control," which, measured by the amount of production, extended to 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the entire output of the country, and that its purpose was to secure great profits, which were thought possible in the light of the history of its constituent combinations, and to accomplish permanently what those combinations had demonstrated could be accomplished temporarily, and thereby monopolize and restrain trade.[1]

[440] The organizers, however (we are still representing the opinion), un-

[1] As bearing upon the power obtained and what the corporation did, we give other citations from Judge Woolley's opinion, as follows:

"The ore reserves acquired by the corporation at and subsequent to its organization, the relation which such reserves bear to ore bodies then existing and subsequently discovered, and their bearing upon the question of monopoly of raw materials, are matters which have been discussed in the preceding opinion. and with derestimated the opposing conditions, and at the very beginning the corporation, instead of relying upon its own power, sought and obtained the assistance and the co-operation of its competitors (the independent companies). In other words, the view was expressed that the testimony did "not show that the corporation, in and of itself, ever possessed or exerted sufficient power when acting alone to control prices of the products of the industry." Its power was efficient only when in co-operation with its competitors, and hence it concerted with them in the expedients of pools, associations, trade meetings, and finally in a system of dinners inaugurated in 1907 by the president of the company, E. H. Gary, and called "the Gary dinners." The dinners were congregations of producers, and "were nothing but trade meetings," successors of the other means of associated action and control through such action. They were instituted first in "stress of panic," but their potency being demonstrated, they were afterwards called to control prices "in periods of industrial calm." "They were pools without penalties" and more efficient in stabilizing prices. But it was the further declaration that "when joint action was either refused or withdrawn, the corporation's prices were controlled by competition."

The corporation, it was said, did not at any time abuse the power or ascendancy it possessed. It resorted to none of the brutalities or tyrannies that the cases illustrate of [441] other combinations. It did not secure freight rebates; it did not increase its profits by reducing the wages of its employees,—whatever it did was not at the expense of labor; it did not increase its profits by lowering the quality of its products, nor create an artificial scarcity of them; it did not oppress or coerce its competitors,—its competition, though vigorous, was fair; it did not undersell its competitors in some localities by reducing its prices there below those maintained elsewhere, or require its customers to enter into contracts limiting their purchases or restricting them in resale prices; it did not obtain customers by secret rebates or departures from its published prices; there was no evidence that it attempted to crush its competitors or drive them out of the market, nor did it take customers from its competitors by unfair means, and in its competition it seemed to make no difference between large and small competitors. Indeed, it is said in many ways and illustrated that "instead of relying upon its own power to fix and maintain prices, the corporation, at its very beginning, sought and obtained the assistance of others." It combined its power with that of its competitors. It did not have power in and of itself, and the control it exerted was only in and by association with its competitors. Its offense, therefore, such as it was, was not different from theirs, and was distinguished from "theirs only in the leadership it assumed in promulgating and perfecting the policy." This leadership it gave up, and it had ceased to offend against the law before this suit was the reasoning as well as with the conclusion that the corporation has not a monopoly of the raw materials of the steel industry, I am in entire accord."

"Further inquiring whether the corporation inherently possesses monopolistic power, attention is next given to its proportion of the manufacture and sale of finished iron and steel products of the industry. Upon this subject there is a great volume of testimony, a detailed consideration of which in an opinion would be quite inexcusable. As a last analysis of this testimony, it is sufficient to say it shows that, large as was the corporation, and substantial as was its proportion of the business of the industry, the corporation was not able in the first ten years of its history to maintain its position in the increase of trade. During that period, its proportion of the domestic business decreased from 50.1 per cent to 40.9 per cent, and its increase of business during that period was but 40.6 per cent of its original volume. Its increase of business, measured by percentage, was exceeded by eight of its competitors, whose increase of business, likewise measured by percentage, ranged from 63 to 3779. This disparity in the increase of production indicates that the power of the corporation is not commensurate with its size, and that the size and the consequent power of the corporation are not sufficient to retard prosperous growth of efficient competitors."

"From the vast amount of testimony, it is conclusively shown that the Steel Corporation did not attempt to exert a power, if such it possessed, to oppress and destroy its competitors, and it is likewise disclosed by the history of the industry subsequent to the organization of the corporation that if it had made such an attempt it would have failed. It is also shown by the testimony that, acting independently and relying alone upon its power and wealth, great as they were, the corporation has never been able to dominate the steel industry by controlling the supply of raw materials, restraining production of finished products, or enhancing and maintaining the prices of either."

brought. It was hence concluded that it should be distinguished from its organizers, and that their intent and unsuccessful attempt should not be attributed to it; that it "in and of itself is not now and has never been a monopoly or a combination in restraint of trade," and a decree of dissolution should not be entered against it.

This summary of the opinions, given necessarily in paraphrase, does not adequately represent their ability [442] and strength, but it has value as indicating the contentions of the parties, and the ultimate propositions to which the contentions are addressed. The opinions indicate that the evidence admits of different deductions as to the genesis of the corporation and the purpose of its organizers, but only of a single deduction as to the power it attained and could exercise. Both opinions were clear and confident that the power of the corporation never did and does not now reach to monopoly, and their review of the evidence, and our independent examination of it, enables us to elect between their respective estimates of it, and we concur in the main with that of Judges Woolley and Hunt. And we add no comment except, it may be, that they underestimated the influence of the tendency and movement to integration, the appreciation of the necessity or value of the continuity of manufacture from the ore to the finished product. And there was such a tendency, and though it cannot be asserted it had become a necessity, it had certainly become a facility of industrial progress. There was, therefore, much to urge it and give incentive to conduct that could accomplish it. From the nature and properties of the industry, the processes of production were something more than the stage and setting of the human activities. They determined to an extent those activities, furnished their motives, and gave test of their quality; not, of course, that the activities could get any immunity from size or resources or energies, whether exerted in integrated plants or diversified ones.

The contentions of the case, therefore, must be judged by the requirements of the law, not by accidental or adventitious circumstances. But what are such circumstances? We have seen that it was the view of the district court that size was such a circumstance and had no accusing or excusing influence. The contention of the government is to the contrary. Its assertion is that the size of the corporation, being the result of a "combination [443] of powerful and able competitors," had become "substantially dominant" in the industry, and illegal. And that this was determined. The companies combined, is the further assertion, had already reached a high degree of efficiency, and in their independence were factors in production and competition, ceased to be such when brought under the regulating control of the corporation, which, by uniting them, offended the law; and that the organizers of the corporation "had in mind the specific purposes of the restraint of trade and the enormous profits resulting from that restraint."

It is the contention of the corporation opposing those of the government and denying the illegal purposes charged against it, that the industry demanded qualities and an enterprise that lesser industries do not demand, and must have a corresponding latitude and facility. Indeed, it is insisted that the industry had practically, to quote the words of Judge Buffington, he quoting those of a witness, "'reached the limit or nearly at which economies from a metallurgical or mechanical standpoint could be made effective,'" and "'that instead, as was then the practice, of having one mill make ten or twenty or fifty products, the greatest economy would result from one mill making one product, and making that product continuously.'" In other words, that there was a necessity for integration and rescue from the old conditions,—from their improvidence and waste of effort,—and that in redress of the conditions the corporation was formed, its purpose and effect being "salvage, not monopoly," to quote the words of counsel. It was, is the insistence, the conception of ability, "a vision of a great business which should embrace all lines of steel and all processes of manufacture, from the ore to the finished product, and which, by reason of the economies thus to be effected and the diversity of products it would be able to offer, could successfully compete in all the markets of the world." [444] It is urged further that to the discernment of that great possibility was added a courage that dared attempt its accomplishment, and the conception and the courage made the formation of the corporation notable, but did not make it illegal.

We state the contentions; we do not have to discuss them, or review the arguments advanced for their acceptance or repulsion. That is done in the opinions of the district judges, and we may well despair to supplement the force of their representation of the conditions antecedent to the formation of the corporation, and in what respect and extent its formation changed them. Of course, in that representation and its details there is guidance to decision, but they must be rightly estimated to judge of what they persuade. Our present purpose is not retrospect for itself, however instructive, but practical decision upon existing conditions, that we may not, by their disturbance, produce, or even risk, consequences of a concern that cannot now be computed. In other words, our consideration should be of not what the corporation had power to do or did, but what it has now power to do and is doing, and what judgment shall be now pronounced,—whether its dissolution, as the government prays, or the dismissal of the suit, as the corporation insists.

The alternatives are perplexing, involve conflicting considerations, which, regarded in isolation, have diverse tendencies. We have seen that the judges of the district court unanimously concurred in the view that the corporation did not achieve monopoly, and such is our deduction, and it is against monopoly that the statute is directed; not against an expectation of it, but against its realization; and it is certain that it was not realized. The opposing conditions were underestimated. The power attained was much greater than that possessed by any one competitor,—it was not greater than that possessed by all of them. Monopoly, therefore, was not achieved, and [445] competitors had to be persuaded by pools, associations, trade meetings, and through the social form of dinners, all of them, it may be, violations of the law, but transient in their purpose and effect. They were scattered through the years from 1901 (the year of the formation of the corporation) until 1911; but, after instances of success and failure, were abandoned nine months before this suit was brought. There is no evidence that the abandonment was in prophecy of or dread of suit; and the illegal practices have not been resumed, nor is there any evidence of an intention to resume them, and certainly no "dangerous probability" of their resumption, the test for which Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 396, 49 L. ed. 524, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 276, is cited. It is our conclusion, therefore, as it was that of the judges below, that the practices were abandoned from a conviction of their futility, from the operation of forces that were not understood or were underestimated, and the case is not peculiar. And we may say in passing that the government cannot fear their resumption, for it did not avail itself of the offer of the district court to retain jurisdiction of the cause in order that, if illegal acts should be attempted, they could be restrained.

What, then, can now be urged against the corporation? Can comparisons in other regards be made with its competitors, and by such comparisons guilty or innocent existence be assigned it? It is greater in size and productive power than any of its competitors, equal or nearly equal to them all, but its power over prices was not and is not commensurate with its power to produce.

It is true there is some testimony tending to show that the corporation had such power, but there was also testimony and a course of action tending strongly to the contrary. The conflict was by the judges of the district court unanimously resolved against the existence of that power, and in doing so they but gave effect to the greater weight of the evidence. It is certain that no such power [446] was exerted. On the contrary, the only attempt at a fixation of prices was, as already said, through an appeal to and confederation with competitors, and the record shows besides that when competition occurred it was not in pretense, and the corporation declined in productive powers,—the competitors growing either against or in consequence of the competition. If against the competition, we have an instance of movement against what the government insists was an irresistible force; if in consequence of competition, we have an illustration of the adage that "competition is the life of trade" and is not easily repressed. The power of monopoly in the corporation under either illustration is an untenable accusation.

We may pause here for a moment to notice illustrations of the government of the purpose of the corporation; instancing its acquisition after its formation of control over the Shelby Steel Tube Company, the Union Steel Company, and, subsequently, the Tennessee Company. There is dispute over the reasons for these acquisitions which we shall not detail. There is, however, an important circumstance in connection with that of the Tennessee Company which is worthy to be noted. It was submitted to President Roosevelt and he gave it his approval. His approval, of course, did not make it legal, but it gives assurance of its legality, and we know from his earnestness in the public welfare he would have approved of nothing that had even a tendency to its detriment. And he testified he was not deceived and that he believed that "the Tennessee Coal & Iron people had a property which was almost worthless in their hands, nearly worthless to them, nearly worthless to the communities in which it was situated, and entirely worthless to any financial institution that had the securities the minute that any panic came, and that the only way to give value to it was to put it in the hands of people whose possession of it [447] would be a guaranty that there was value to it." Such being the emergency, it seems like an extreme accusation to say that the corporation which relieved it, and, perhaps, rescued the company and the communities dependent upon it from disaster, was urged by unworthy motives. Did illegality attach afterwards, and how? And what was the corporation to do with the property? Let it decay in desuetude, or develop its capabilities and resources? In the development, of course, there would be profit to the corporation, but there would be profit as well to the world. For this reason President Roosevelt sanctioned the purchase, and it would seem a distempered view of purchase and result to regard them as violations of law.

From this digression we return to the consideration of the conduct of the corporation to its competitors. Besides the circumstances which we have mentioned, there are others of probative strength. The company's officers, and, as well, its competitors and customers, testified that its competition was genuine, direct, and vigorous, and was reflected in prices and production. No practical witness was produced by the government in opposition. Its contention is based on the size and asserted dominance of the corporation,—alleged power for evil, not the exertion of the power in evil. Or, as counsl put it, " a combination may be illegal because of its purpose; it may be illegal because it acquires a dominating power, not as a result of normal growth and development, but as a result of a combination of competitors." Such composition and its resulting power constitute, in the view of the government, the offense against the law, and yet it is admitted "no competitor came forward and said he had to accept the Steel Corporation's prices." But this absence of complaint counsel urge against the corporation. Competitors, it is said, followed the corporation's prices because they made money by the imitation. Indeed, the imitation is urged as [448] an evidence of the corporation's power. "Universal imitation," counsel assert, is "an evidence of power." In this concord of action, the contention is, there is the sinister dominance of the corporation,—"its extensive control of the industry is such that the others [independent companies] follow." Counsel, however, admit that there was "occasionally" some competition, but reject the suggestion that it extended practically to a war between the corporation and the independents. Counsel say, "They [the corporation is made a plural] called a few—they called two hundred witnesses out of some forty thousand customers, and they expect with that customer evidence to overcome the whole train of price movement shown since the corporation was formed." And by "movement of prices," counsel explained, "as shown by the published prices . . . they were the ones that the competitors were maintaining all during the interval."

It would seem that "two hundred witnesses" would be fairly representative. Besides, the balance of the "forty thousand customers" was open to the government to draw upon. Not having done so, is it not permissible to infer that none would testify to the existence of the influence that the government asserts? At any rate, not one was called, but, instead, the opinion of an editor of a trade journal is adduced, and that of an author and teacher of economics whose philosophical deductions had, perhaps, fortification from experience as Deputy Commissioner of Corporations and as an employee in the Bureau of Corporations. His deduction was that when prices are constant through a definite period an artificial influence is indicated; if they vary during such a period it is a consequence of competitive conditions. It has become an aphorism that there is danger of deception in generalities, and in a case of this importance we should have something surer for judgment than speculation,—something more than a deduction equivocal of itself, even though the [449] facts it rests on or asserts were not contradicted. If the phenomena of production and prices were as easily resolved as the witness implied, much discussion and much literature have been wasted, and some of the problems that are now distracting the world would be given composing solution. Of course, competition affects prices, but it is only one among other influences, and does not, more than they, register itself in definite and legible effect.

We magnify the testimony by its consideration. Against it competitors, dealers, and customers of the corporation testify in multitude that no adventitious interference was employed to either fix or maintain prices, and that they were constant or varied according to natural conditions. Can this testimony be minimized or dismissed by inferring that, as intimated, it is an evidence of power, not of weakness, and power exerted not only to suppress competition, but to compel testimony, is the necessary inference, shading into perjury to deny its exertion? The situation is indeed singular, and we may wonder at it,—wonder that the despotism of the corporation, so baneful to the world in the representation of the government, did not produce protesting victims.

But there are other paradoxes. The government does not hesitate to present contradictions, though only one can be true, such being, we were told in our school books, the "principle of contradiction." In one, competitors (the independents) are represented as oppressed by the superior power of the corporation; in the other, they are represented as ascending to opulence by imitating that power's prices, which they could not do if at disadvantage from the other conditions of competition; and yet confederated action is not asserted. If it were, this suit would take on another cast. The competitors would cease to be the victims of the corporation, and would become its accomplices. And there is no other alternative. The suggestion [450] that lurks in the government's contention that the acceptance of the corporation's prices is the submission of impotence to irresistible power is, in view of the testimony of the competitors, untenable. They, as we have seen, deny restraint in any measure or illegal influence of any kind. The government, therefore, is reduced to the assertion that the size of the corporation, the power it may have, not the exertion of the power, is an abhorrence to the law; or, as the government says, "the combination embodied in the corporation unduly restrains competition by its necessary effect [the italics are the emphasis of the government], and therefore is unlawful regardless of purpose." "A wrongful purpose," the government adds, is "matter of aggravation." The illegality is statical, purpose or movement of any kind only its emphasis. To assent to that, to what extremes should we be led? Competition consists of business activities and ability,—they make its life; but there may be fatalities in it. Are the activities to be encouraged when militant, and suppressed or regulated when triumphant because of the dominance attained? To such paternalism the government's contention, which regards power rather than its use the determining consideration, seems to conduct. Certainly conducts, we may say, for it is the inevitable logic of the government's contention that competition must not only be free, but that it must not be pressed to the ascendancy of a competitor, for in ascendancy there is the menace of monopoly.

We have pointed out that there are several of the government's contentions which are difficult to represent or measure; and the one we are now considering, that is, the power is "unlawful regardless of purpose," is another of them. It seems to us that it has for its ultimate principle and justification that strength in any producer or seller is a menace to the public interest and illegal because there is potency in it for mischief. The regression is extreme, but [451] short of it the government cannot stop. The fallacy it conveys is manifest.

The corporation was formed in 1901; no act of aggression upon its competitors is charged against it; it confederated with them at times in offense against the law, but abandoned that before this suit was brought, and since 1911 no act in violation of law can be established against it except its existence be such an act. This is urged, as we have seen, and that the interest of the public is involved, and that such interest is paramount to corporation or competitors. Granted,—though it is difficult to see how there can be restraint of trade when there is no restraint of competitors in the trade nor complaints by customers, —how can it be worked out of the situation and through what proposition of law? Of course it calls for nothing other than a right application of the law, and, to repeat what we have said above, shall we declare the law to be that size is an offense, even though it minds its own business, because what it does is imitated? The corporation is undoubtedly of impressive size, and it takes an effort of resolution not to be affected by it or to exaggerate its influence. But we must adhere to the law, and the law does not make mere size an offense or the existence of unexerted power an offense. It, we repeat, requires overt acts, and trusts to its prohibition of them and its power to repress or punish them. It does not compel competition, nor require all that is possible.

Admitting, however, that there is pertinent strength in the propositions of the government, and in connection with them, we recall the distinction we made in the Standard Oil Co. Case (221 U. S. 1, 77, 55 L. ed. 619, 652, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734) between acts done in violation of the statute and a condition brought about which, "in and of itself, is not only a continued attempt to monopolize, but also a monopolization." In such case, we declared, "the duty to enforce the statute" required "the application of broader and more controlling" remedies [452] than the other. And the remedies applied conformed to the declaration; there was prohibition of future acts and there was dissolution of "the combination found to exist in violation of the statute" in order to "neutralize the extension and continually operating force which the possession of the power unlawfully obtained" had "brought" and would "continue to bring about."

Are the case and its precepts applicable here? The Steel Corporation by its formation united under one control competing companies, and thus, it is urged, a condition was brought about in violation of the statute, and therefore illegal, and became a "continually operating force," with the "possession of power unlawfully obtained."

But there are countervailing considerations. We have seen whatever there was of wrong intent could not be executed; whatever there was of evil effect was discontinued before this suit was brought, and this, we think, determines the decree. We say this in full realization of the requirements of the law. It is clear in its denunciation of monopolies, and equally clear in its direction that the courts of the nation shall prevent and restrain them (its language is "to prevent and restrain violations of" the act), but the command is necessarily submissive to the conditions which may exist and the usual powers of a court of equity to adapt its remedies to those conditions. In other words, it is not expected to enforce abstractions and do injury thereby, it may be, to the purpose of the law. It is this flexibility of discretion—indeed, essential function—that makes its value in our jurisprudence,—value in this case as in others. We do not mean to say that the law is not its own measure, and that it can be disregarded, but only that the appropriate relief in each instance is remitted to a court of equity to determine; not, and let us be explicit in this, to advance a policy contrary to that of the law, but in submission to the law and its policy. and in execution of both, and it is certainly a [453] matter for consideration that there was no legal attack on the corporation until 1911, ten years after its formation and the commencement of its career. We do not, however, speak of the delay simply as to its time, or say that there is estoppel in it because of its time, but on account of what was done during that time,—the many millions of dollars spent, the development made, and the enterprises undertaken; the investments by the public that have been invited and are not to be ignored. And what of the foreign trade that has been developed and exists? The government, with some inconsistency, it seems to us, would remove this from the decree of dissolution. Indeed, it is pointed out that under congressional legislation in the Webb Act the foreign trade of the corporation is reserved to it. And further, it is said, that the corporation has constructed a company called the Products Company which can be "very easily preserved as a medium through which the steel business might reach the balance of the world," and that in the decree of "dissolution that could be provided." This is supplemented by the suggestion that not only the Steel Corporation, "but other steel makers of the country, could function through an instrumentality created under the Webb Act."

The propositions and suggestions do not commend themselves. We do not see how the Steel Corporation can be such a beneficial instrumentality in the trade of the world and its beneficence be preserved, and yet be such an evil instrumentality in the trade of the United States that it must be destroyed. And by whom and how shall all the adjustments of preservation or destruction be made? How can the corporation be sustained and its power of control over its subsidiary companies be retained and exercised in the foreign trade and given up in the domestic trade? The government presents no solution of the problem. Counsel realize the difficulty and seem to think that its solution or its evasion is in the suggestion [454] that the Steel Corporation and "other steel makers could function through an instrumentality created under the Webb Act." But we are confronted with the necessity of immediate judicial action under existing laws, not action under conceptions which may never be capable of legal execution. We must now decide, and we see no guide to decision in the propositions of the government.

The government, however, tentatively presents a proposition which has some tangibility. It submits that certain of the subsidiary companies are so mechanically equipped and so officially directed as to be released and remitted to independent action and individual interests and the competition to which such interests prompt, without any disturbance to business. The companies are enumerated. They are the Carnegie Steel Company (a combination of the old Carnegie Company, the National Steel Company, and the American Steel Company), the Federal Steel Company, the Tennessee Company, and the Union Steel Company (a combination of the Union Steel Company of Donora, Pennsylvania, Sharon Steel Company of Sharon, Pennsylvania, and Sharon Tin Plate Company). They are fully integrated, it is said, possess their own supplies, facilities of transportation and distribution. They are subject to the Steel Corporation is, in effect, the declaration, in nothing but its control of their prices. We may say parenthetically that they are defendants in the suit and charged as offenders, and we have the strange circumstance of violators of the law being urged to be used as expedients of the law.

But let us see what guide to a procedure of dissolution of the corporation and the dispersion as well of its subsidiary companies, for they are asserted to be illegal combinations, is prayed. And the fact must not be overlooked or underestimated. The prayer of the government calls for not only a disruption of present conditions, but the restoration of the conditions of twenty years ago; if [455] not literally, substantially. Is there guidance to this in the Standard Oil Co. Case and the American Tobacco Co. Case, 221 U. S. 106, 55 L. ed. 663, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632? As an element in determining the answer we shall have to compare the cases with that at bar, but this can only be done in a general way. And the law necessarily must be kept in mind. No other comment of it is necessary. It has received so much exposition that it and all it prescribes and proscribes should be considered as a consciously directing presence.

The Standard Oil Company had its origin in 1882, and through successive forms of combinations and agencies it progressed in illegal power to the day of the decree, even attempting to circumvent by one of its forms the decision of a court against it. And its methods in using its power was of the kind that Judge Woolley described as "brutal," and of which practices, he said, the Steel Corporation was absolutely guiltless. We have enumerated them, and this reference to them is enough. And of the practices, this court said, no disinterested mind could doubt that the purpose was "to drive others from the field and to exclude them from their right to trade, and thus accomplish the mastery which was the end in view." It was further said that what was done and the final culmination "in the plan of the New Jersey corporation" made "manifest the continued existence of the intent . . . and impelled the expansion of the New Jersey corporation." It was to this corporation, which represented the power and purpose of all that preceded, that the suit was addressed and the decree of the court was to apply. What we have quoted contrasts that case with this. The contrast is further emphasized by pointing out how, in the case of the New Jersey corporation, the original wrong was reflected in and manifested by the acts which followed the organization, as described by the court. It said: "The exercise of the power which resulted from that organization fortifies the foregoing conclusions [as to monopoly, etc.], since the [456] development which came, the acquisition here and there which ensued of every efficient means by which competition could have been asserted, the slow but resistless methods which followed by which means of transportation were absorbed and brought under control, the system of marketing which was adopted, by which the country was divided into districts and the trade in each district in oil was turned over to the designated corporation within the combination and all others were excluded, all lead the mind up to a conviction of a purpose and intent which we think is so certain as practically to cause the subject not to be within the domain of reasonable contention."

The American Tobacco Co. Case has the same bad distinctions as the Standard Oil Co. Case. The illegality in which it was formed [there were two American Tobacco Companies, but we use the name as designating the new company, as representing the combinations of the suit] continued, indeed, progressed in intensity and defiance to the moment of decree. And it is the intimation of the opinion, if not its direct assertion, that the formation of the company (the word "combination" is used) was preceded by the intimidation of a trade war, "inspired by one or more of the minds which brought about and became parties to that combination." In other words, the purpose of the combination was signaled to competitors, and the choice presented to them was submission or ruin,—to become parties to the illegal enterprise or be driven "out of the business." This was the purpose and the achievement, and the processes by which achieved, this court enumerated to be the formation of new companies, taking stock in others to "obscure the result actually attained, but always to monopolize and retain power in the hands of the few and mastery of the trade; putting control in the hands of seemingly independent corporations as barriers to the entry of others into the trade; the expenditure of millions upon millions in buying out plants, not to utilize them, but to close them; by constantly [457] recurring stipulations by which numbers of persons, whether manufacturers, stockholders, or employees, were required to bind themselves, generally for long periods, not to compete in the future. In the American Tobacco Co. Case, therefore, as in the Standard Oil Co. Case, the court had to deal with a persistent and systematic lawbreaker, masquerading under legal forms, and which not only had to be stripped of its disguises, but arrested in its illegality. A decree of dissolution was the manifest instrumentality, and inevitable. We think it would be a work of sheer supererogation to point out that a decree in that case or in the Standard Oil Co. Case furnishes no example for a decree in this.

In conclusion, we are unable to see that the public interest will be served by yielding to the contention of the government respecting the dissolution of the company or the separation from it of some of its subsidiaries; and we do see in a contrary conclusion a risk of injury to the public interest, including a material disturbance of, and, it may be, serious detriment to, the foreign trade. And in submission to the policy of the law and its fortifying prohibitions the public interest is of paramount regard.

We think, therefore, that the decree of the District Court should be affirmed.

So ordered.

Mr. Justice Day, dissenting:

This record seems to me to leave no fair room for a doubt that the defendants, the United States Steel Corporation and the several subsidiary corporations which make up that organization, were formed in violation of the Sherman Act [Act of July 2, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, Comp. Stat. § 8820, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. 644]. I am unable to accept the conclusion [458] which directs a dismissal of the bill instead of following the well-settled practice, sanctioned by previous decisions of this court, requiring the dissolution of combinations made in direct violation of the law.

It appears to be thoroughly established that the formation of the corporations here under consideration constituted combinations between competitors, in violation of law, and intended to remove competition and to directly restrain trade. I agree with the conclusions of Judges Woolley and Hunt, expressed in the court below (223 Fed. 161 et seq.), that the combinations were not submissions to business conditions, but were designed to control them for illegal purposes, regardless of other consequences, and "were made upon a scale that was huge and in a manner that was wild," and "properties were assembled and combined with less regard to their importance as integral parts of an integrated whole than to the advantages expected from the elimination of the competition which theretofore existed between them." Those judges found that the constituent companies of the United States Steel Corporation, nine in number, were themselves combinations of steel manufacturers, and the effect of the organization of these combinations was to give a control over the industry at least equal to that theretofore possessed by the constituent companies and their subsidiaries. That the Steel Corporation was a combination of combinations by which, directly or indirectly, 180 independent concerns were brought under one control, and in the language of Judge Woolley (p. 167):

"Without referring to the great mass of figures which bears upon this aspect of the case, it is clear to me that combinations were created by acquiring competing producing concerns at figures not based upon their physical or business values, as independent and separate producers, but upon their values in combination; that is, upon their values as manufacturing plants and business [459] concerns with competition eliminated. In many instances, capital stock was issued for amounts vastly in excess of the values of the properties purchased, thereby capitalizing the anticipated fruits of combination. The control acquired over the branches of the industry to which the combinations particularly related, measured by the amount of production, extended in some instances from 80 per cent to 95 per cent of the entire output of the country, resulting in the immediate increase in prices, in some cases double and in others treble what they were before, yielding large dividends upon greatly inflated capital.

"The immediate, as well as the normal, effect of such combinations, was in all instances a complete elimination of competition between the concerns absorbed, and a corresponding restraint of trade."

The enormous overcapitalization of companies and the appropriation of $100,000,000 in stock to promotion expenses were represented in the stock issues of the new organizations thus formed, and were the basis upon which large dividends have been declared from the profits of the business. This record shows that the power obtained by the corporation brought under its control large competing companies which were of themselves illegal combinations, and succeeded to their power; that some of the organizers of the Steel Corporation were parties to the preceding combinations, participated in their illegality, and, by uniting them under a common direction, intended to augment and perpetuate their power. It is the irresistible conclusion from these premises that great profits to be derived from unified control were the object of these organizations.

The contention must be rejected that the combination was an inevitable evolution of industrial tendencies compelling union of endeavor. Nothing could add to the vivid accuracy with which Judge Woolley, speaking for himself [460] and Judge Hunt, has stated the illegality of the organization, and its purpose to combine in one great corporation the previous combinations by a direct violation of the purposes and terms of the Sherman Act.

For many years, as the record discloses, this unlawful organization exerted its power to control and maintain prices by pools, associations, trade meetings, and as the result of discussion and agreements at the so-called "Gary dinners," where the assembled trade opponents secured co-operation and joint action through the machinery of special committees of competing concerns, and by prudent provision took into account the possibility of defection, and the means of controlling and perpetuating that industrial harmony which arose from the control and maintenance of prices.

It inevitably follows that the corporation violated the law in its formation and by its immediate practices. The power, thus obtained from the combination of resources almost unlimited in the aggregation of competing organizations, had within its control the domination of the trade, and the ability to fix prices and restrain the free flow of commerce upon a scale heretofore unapproached in the history of corporate organization in this country.

These facts established, as it seems to me they are by the record, it follows that if the Sherman Act is to be given efficacy, there must be a decree undoing, so far as is possible, that which has been achieved in open, notorious, and continued violation of its provisions.

I agree that the act offers no objection to the mere size of a corporation, nor to the continued exertion of its lawful power, when that size and power have been obtained by lawful means and developed by natural growth, although its resources, capital, and strength may give to such corporation a dominating place in the business and industry with which it is concerned. It is entitled to maintain its size and the power that legitimately goes with it, provided [461] no law has been transgressed in obtaining it. But I understand the reiterated decisions of this court construing the Sherman Act to hold that this power may not legally be derived from conspiracies, combinations, or contracts in restraint of trade. To permit this would be to practically annul the Sherman Law by judicial decree. This principle has been so often declared by the decisions that it is only necessary to refer to some of them. It is the scope of such combinations, and their power to suppress and stifle competition and create or tend to create monopolies, which, as we have declared so often as to make its reiteration monotonous, it was the purpose of the Sherman Act to condemn, including all combinations and conspiracies to restrain the free and natural flow of trade in the channels of interstate commerce. Pearsall v. Great Northern R. Co. 161 U. S. 646, 676, 677, 40 L. ed. 838, 848, 849, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705; Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. Case, 166 U. S. 290, 324, 41 L. ed. 1007, 1021, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; Northern Securities Case, 193 U. S. 197, 48 L. ed. 679, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 238, 44 L. ed. 136, 146, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96; Harriman v. Northern Securities Co. 197 U. S. 244, 291, 49 L. ed. 739, 761, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Union Pacific R. Co. Case, 226 U. S. 61, 88, 57 L. ed. 124, 134, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 53. While it was not the purpose of the act to condemn normal and usual contracts to lawfully expand business and further legitimate trade, it did intend to effectively reach and control all conspiracies and combinations or contracts of whatever form which unduly restrain competition and unduly obstruct the natural course of trade, or which, from their nature or effect, have proved effectual to restrain interstate commerce. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 55 L. ed. 619, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734; United States v. American Tobacco Co. 221 U. S. 106, 55 L. ed. 663, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 632; United States v. Reading Co. 226 U. S. 324, 57 L. ed. 243, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 90; Straus v. American Publishers' Asso. 231 U. S. 222, 58 L. ed. 192, L.R.A. 1915A, 1099, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 84, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 369; Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Asso. v. United States, 234 U. S. 600, 58 L. ed. 1490, L.R.A. 1915A, 788, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 951.

This statute has been in force for nearly thirty years. It has been frequently before this court for consideration, and the nature and character of the relief to be granted [462] against combinations found guilty of violations of it have been the subject of much consideration. Its interpretation has become a part of the law itself, and if changes are to be made now in its construction or operation, it seems to me that the exertion of such authority rests with Congress, and not with the courts.

The 4th section is intended to give to courts of equity of the United States the power to effectively control and restrain violations of the act. In none of the cases which have been before the courts was the character of the relief to be granted, where organizations were found to be within the condemnation of the act, more thoroughly considered than in the Standard Oil and American Tobacco Co. Cases reported in 221 U. S. In the former case, considering the measure of relief to be granted in the case of a combination, certainly not more obnoxious to the Sherman Act than the court now finds the one under consideration to be, this court declared that it must be twofold in character (221 U. S. 78): "1st. To forbid the doing in the future of acts like those which we have found to have been done in the past which would be violative of the statute. 2d. The exertion of such measure of relief as will effectually dissolve the combination found to exist in violation of the statute, and thus neutralize the extension and continually operating force which the possession of the power unlawfully obtained has brought and will continue to bring about."

In the American Tobacco Co. Case the nature of the relief to be granted was again given consideration, and it was there concluded that the only effectual remedy was to dissolve the combination and the companies comprising it, and for that purpose the cause was remanded to the district court to hear the parties and determine a method of dissolution and of recreating from the elements composing it "a new condition which should be in honest harmony with, and not repugnant to, the law." In that [463] case the corporations dissolved had long been in existence, and the offending companies were organized years before the suit was brought and before the decree of dissolution was finally made. Such facts were considered no valid objection to the dissolution of these powerful organizations as the only effective means of enforcing the purposes of the Sherman Anti-trust Act. These cases have been frequently followed in this court, and in the lower Federal courts, in determining the nature of the relief to be granted, and I see no occasion to depart from them now.

As I understand the conclusions of the court affirming the decree directing dismissal of the bill, they amount to this: that these combinations, both the holding company and the subsidiaries which comprise it, although organized in plain violation and bold defiance of the provisions of the act, nevertheless are immune from a decree effectually ending the combinations and putting it out of their power to attain the unlawful purposes sought, because of some reasons of public policy requiring such conclusion. I know of no public policy which sanctions a violation of the law, nor of any inconvenience to trade, domestic or foreign, which should have the effect of placing combinations, which have been able to thus organize one of the greatest industries of the country in defiance of law, in an impregnable position above the control of the law forbidding such combinations. Such a conclusion does violence to the policy which the law was intended to enforce, runs counter to the decisions of the court, and necessarily results in a practical nullification of the act itself.

There is no mistaking the terms of the act as they have hitherto been interpreted by this court. It was not intended to merely suppress unfair practices, but, as its history and terms amply show, it was intended to make it criminal to form combinations or engage in conspiracies or contracts in restraint of interstate trade. The remedy by injunction, at the instance of the Attorney General, was [464] given for the purpose of enabling the courts, as the statute states, to prohibit such conspiracies, combinations, and contracts, and this court, interpreting its provisions, has held that the proper enforcement of the act requires decrees to end combinations by dissolving them and restoring as far as possible the competitive conditions which the combinations have destroyed. I am unable to see force in the suggestion that public policy, or the assumed disastrous effect upon foreign trade of dissolving the unlawful combination, is sufficient to entitle it to immunity from the enforcement of the statute.

Nor can I yield assent to the proposition that this combination has not acquired a dominant position in the trade which enables it to control prices and production when it sees fit to exert its power. Its total assets on December 31, 1913, were in excess of $1,800,000,000; its outstanding capital stock was $868,583,600; its surplus $151,798,428. Its cash on hand ordinarily was $75,000,000; this sum alone exceeded the total capitalization of any of its competitors, and, with a single exception, the total capitalization and surplus of any one of them. That such an organization, thus fortified and equipped, could, if it saw fit, dominate the trade and control competition, would seem to be a business proposition too plain to require extended argument to support it. Its resources, strength, and comprehensive ownership of the means of production enable it to adopt measures to do again as it has done in the past; that is, to effectually dominate and control the steel business of the country. From the earliest decisions of this court it has been declared that it was the effective power of such organizations to control and restrain competition and the freedom of trade that Congress intended to limit and control. That the exercise of the power may be withheld, or exerted with forbearing benevolence, does not place such combinations beyond the authority of the statute which was intended to prohibit their formation, [465] and, when formed, to deprive them of the power unlawfully attained.

It is said that a complete monopolization of the steel business was never attained by the offending combinations. To insist upon such result would be beyond the requirements of the statute, and in most cases practically impossible. As we said in dealing with the packers' combination in Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 396, 49 L. ed. 524, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 276: "Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent,—for instance, the monopoly,—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. Com. v. Peaslee, 177 Mass. 267, 272, 59 N. E. 55. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist, this statute [Sherman Act] like many others and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against that dangerous probability as well as against the completed result."

It is affirmed that to grant the government's request for a remand to the district court for a decree of dissolution would not result in a change in the conditions of the steel trade. Such is not the theory of the Sherman Act. That act was framed in the belief that attempted or accomplished monopolization, or combinations which suppress free competition, were hurtful to the public interest, and that a restoration of competitive conditions would benefit the public. We have here a combination in control of one half of the steel business of the country. If the plan were followed, as in the American Tobacco Co. Case, of remanding the case to the district court, a decree might be framed restoring competitive conditions as far as practicable. See United States v. American Tobacco Co. 191 Fed. 371. In that case the subject of reconstruction so as to restore such conditions was elaborated and carefully [466] considered. In my judgment the principles there laid down, if followed now, would make a very material difference in the steel industry. Instead of one dominating corporation, with scattered competitors, there would be competitive conditions throughout the whole trade which would carry into effect the policy of the law.

It seems to me that if this act is to be given effect, the bill, under the findings of fact made by the court, should not be dismissed, and the cause should be remanded to the district court, where a plan of effective and final dissolution of the corporations should be enforced by a decree framed for that purpose.

Argued October 21, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

FIVE WRITS of Error to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review convictions under the Espionage Act. Judgments in Nos. 272, 273, and 274 affirmed; in Nos. 270 and 271 reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 254 Fed. 135.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William A. Gray argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Henry John Nelson also argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiffs in error Schaefer and Vogel.

Assistant Attorney General Stewart argued the cause, and, with Solicitor General King and Mr. W. C. Heron, filed a brief for defendant in error.

[468] Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Indictment in nine counts under the Espionage Act [June 15, 1917, 40 Stat. at L. 217, chap. 30, Comp. Stat. § 10,212a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 120]. Preliminary to indicating the special offenses, we may say that the indictment charges that at the dates mentioned therein the Philadelphia Tageblatt and the Philadelphia Sonntagsblatt were newspapers printed and published in the German language in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Tageblatt Association, a Pennsylvania corporation of which defendants were officers; Peter Schaefer being president, Vogel treasurer, Werner chief editor, Darkow managing editor, and Lemke business manager.

That on the dates mentioned in the indictment the United States was at war with the Imperial German Government, and the defendants "knowingly, wilfully, and unlawfully" "caused to be printed, published, and circulated in and through" one or other of those newspapers, false reports and statements of certain news items or despatches purporting to be from foreign places, or otherwise violated the Espionage Act through editorials or other published matter.

In count one the charge is that the intent was "to promote the success of the enemies of the United States; to wit, the said Imperial German Government."

In counts two, three, and four the charge is the obstruction of the "recruiting and enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the United States."

In count five the purpose of publication is charged to be the making of false reports and statements with intent to promote the success of the enemies of the United States.

In counts six, seven, and eight there are charges of intent to like purpose.

Count nine charges a conspiracy entered into by defendants, to be executed through the agency of the two [469] newspapers, for the purpose (a) to make false reports and statements with intent to interfere with the military and naval operations and success of the United States and to promote the success of its enemies; (b) to cause insubordination, disloyalty, and mutiny in the military and naval forces of the United States; (c) to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States. And there were specifications in support of the charges.

Demurrers were opposed to the indictment, which stated in detail the insufficiency of the indictment to constitute offenses. The demurrers were overruled, the court considering that the grounds of attack upon the indictment could be raised at the trial.

The defendants were then arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and, when called for trial, moved for a severance, urging as the reason that the courts had ruled that defendants, when tried jointly, must join in "their challenge to jurors." Counsel in effect said they contested the ruling, and considered the statute upon which it was based to be "in derogation of the individual's rights, guaranteed to him by the Constitution."

Other grounds for severance were urged, but the court denied the motion, and to the ruling each of the defendants excepted. In fortification of the motion for severance, at the selection of the jury, counsel, in succession for each defendant, challenged particular jurors peremptorily, expressing at the same time the acceptance by the other defendants of the challenged jurors. After ten such challenges had been made, counsel interposed a peremptory challenge to other jurors in behalf of all of the defendants, stating as reasons that they "collectively" were not "bound by what their codefendants may have done with respect to any particular juror, and that, therefore, they are still within their rights." The court denied the challenge, ruling that, under the provisions of the act of Congress, "all the defendants will be deemed a single party, [470] and ten challenges having been exercised in the aggregate, the right of challenge is exhausted."

Defendants excepted and the trial proceeded, resulting in a verdict as follows: Schaefer and Vogel guilty on count nine only; Werner on counts one, two, four, and nine; Darkow on one, three, five, six, and nine; Lemke on count nine only.

Motions for arrest of judgment and for a new trial were made and overruled, and defendants were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

The case is here upon writ of error directly to the district court, as involving constitutional questions.

It is conceded that the constitutionality of the Espionage Act has been sustained (Sugarman v. United States, 249 U. S. 182, 63 L. ed. 550, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 191), but the constitutionality of the Act of March 3, 1911, chapter 231, § 287 [36 Stat. at L. 1166, Comp. Stat. § 1264, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1078], by which several defendants may be treated as one party for the purpose of peremptory challenges, is attacked. Its constitutionality is established by Stilson v. United States, decided November 10, 1919, 250 U. S. 583, 63 L. ed. 1154, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28.

The other assignments of error are: (1) The government failed to prove the charge of making false statements as the same was made in the indictment, and that therefore the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to acquit upon the counts charging the offense. (2) "In passing upon the question of falsity of the despatches as published by appellants, and in passing upon any other questions which are a matter of public knowledge and general information," the court erred in instructing the jury that "they had a right to call upon the fund of knowledge which was in their keeping." (3) The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to render a verdict of not guilty upon all of the counts in case of each of the defendants.

Assignments one and three may be considered together. They both depend upon an appreciation of the evidence, [471] although assignment one is more particular as to the offense charged. But neither can be discussed without a review of the evidence, and a detailed estimation of its strength, direct and inferential. That, however, is impossible, as the evidence occupies over three hundred pages of the record, and counsel have not given us an analysis or compendium of it, but have thrust upon us a transcript of the stenographer's notes of the trial which, counsel for the government aptly says, "presents" of the case "a picture of a certain sort, but it is a picture which is constantly out of focus, being either larger than the reality or smaller." However, we have accepted the labor it imposed, and have considered the parts of the evidence in their proper proportions and relation, and brought them to an intelligible focus, and are of opinion that the court rightfully refused the requested instructions except as to the defendants Schaefer and Vogel. As to them we do not think that there was substantial evidence to sustain the conviction. They were acquitted, we have seen, of all the individual and active offenses, and found guilty only on the ninth count—the charge of conspiracy.

The second assignment of error is somewhat confusedly expressed. It, however, presents an exception to the charge of the court as to what the jurors were entitled to consider as matters of public knowledge and general information. Counsel apparently urge against the charge that it submitted all the accusations of the indictment to the proof of the public knowledge and general information that the jurors possessed. The charge is not open to the contention, and, as discussion is precluded except through a consideration of the instructions in their entirety, we answer the contention by a simple declaration of dissent from it, based, however, we may say, on a consideration of the instructions as a whole, not in fragments, detached and isolated from their explanations and qualifications. Counsel at the trial attempted [472] to assign to the charge the generality they now assert, and it was rejected.

It is difficult to reach or consider the particulars of counsel's contention, the foundation of which seems to be that the indictment charged the falsification of the "despatches," and that, therefore, the government must prove the falsification of them. What counsel mean by

"falsification" is not easy to represent, they conceding there was proof that "the articles which were published differ from the articles in the papers from which they were copied," but contending that no evidence was offered of what was contained in the original despatches of which the publications purported to be copies. And again counsel say: "The falsity, as it has been called, which was proven against the defendants, was that the articles which were published differed from the articles in the papers from which they were copied." The charge and proof, therefore, were of alterations,—giving the "despatches" by a change or characterization a meaning that they did not originally bear,—a meaning that weakened the spirit of recruiting and destroyed or lessened that zeal and animation necessary or helpful to raise and operate our armies in the then pending war. And there could be no more powerful or effective instruments of evil than two German newspapers organized and conducted as these papers were organized and conducted.

Such being the situation, and the defendants having testified in their own behalf, and having opportunity of explanation of the changes they made of the articles which they copied, the court instructed the jury as follows: "In passing upon this question of falsity, and in passing upon this question of intent, and in passing upon, of course, the question of whether or not we are at war, you are permitted to use your general knowledge. I will withdraw the reference to the 'intent,' but in passing upon the question of the falsity of these publications, in passing upon the question [473] whether we are at war, and in passing upon any other questions which are in like manner a matter of public knowledge and of general information, you have the right to call upon the fund of general information which is in your keeping."

The criticism counsel make of the charge is that "without any proof whatsoever he [the judge] permitted them [the jury] to apply their general knowledge in determining whether the despatches published by the defendants contained false statements." Indeed, counsel go further, and insist that the charge gave to the jury an unlimited right to use any general information at their disposal in reaching their verdict. The charge itself refutes such sweeping characterization. Nor is it justified. The court said: "The real offense with which these defendants are charged is in putting out these false statements. They received them from a source. That source purported to be the report of a despatch, and the evidence in this case would seem to direct your minds in at least some of these instances, perhaps in many of them, to just where the report of the despatch appeared. They took that report as it came to them, and the charge is, in plain words, that they garbled it, sometimes by adding something to it and sometimes by leaving things out, and sometimes by a change of words. But the substantial thing which you are to pass upon is, was the report or statement that they put out false? Was it wilfully and knowingly false? Was it put out thus falsified with the intent to promote the success of the enemies of the United States?" In other words, the minds of the jurors were directed to the gist of the case, which was despatches received and then changed to express falsehood, to the detriment of the success of the United States, and the fact and effect of change the jurors might judge of from the testimony as presented, and "from the fund of information which was in" their "keeping." That is, from the fact of the source [474] from which the despatches were received, from the fact of war, and what was necessary for its spirited and effective conduct, and how far a false cast to the despatches received was depressing or detrimental to patriotic ardor. See Stilson v. United States, supra.

This disposes of the case on the exceptions which are argued. Exceptions one and two are specific and we have discussed them. Exception three is general and involves not only the points we have discussed and selected by counsel for discussion, but involves besides every other objection to the instructions and the sufficiency of the evidence, in all the aspects they can be viewed and estimated.

And as being within its comprehension we are confronted with a contention that the indictment and conviction are violative of the freedom of speech and of the press protected by the Constitution of the United States. The contention is a serious one, and, in its justification, it is urged that the power of Congress to interfere with the freedom of speech and of the press must be judged by an exercise of reason on the circumstances. Therefore, in justice to the tribunal below, indeed, to ourselves, we must give attention to the contention.

It is not very susceptible of measurement. It is difficult to separate, in view of the contentions that are made, a judgment of the law from a judgment of conviction under the law, and keep free from confusing considerations. Free speech is not an absolute right, and when it or any right becomes wrong by excess is somewhat elusive of definition. However, some admissions may be made. That freedom of speech and of the press are elements of liberty all will acclaim. Indeed, they are so intimate to liberty in everyone's convictions—we may say feelings—that there is an instinctive and instant revolt from any limitation of them either by law or a charge under the law, and judgment must be summoned against the impulse that might condemn [475] a limitation without consideration of its propriety. But, notwithstanding this instant jealousy of any limitation of speech or of the press, there is adduced an instance of oppression by the government, and, it is said, to hold that publications such as those in this case "can be suppressed as false reports, subjects to new perils the constitutional liberty of the press, already seriously curtailed in practice under powers assumed to have been conferred upon the postal authorities."

If there be such practice, this case is not concerned with it. The assertion of its existence, therefore, we are not called upon to consider, as there is nothing before us to justify it. Therefore, putting it aside and keeping free from exaggerations, and alarms prompted by an imagination of improbable conditions, we bring this case, as it should be brought, like other criminal cases, to no other scrutiny or submission than to the sedate and guiding principles of criminal justice. And this was the effort of the trial court, and was impressed on the jury.

The court drew the attention of the jury to "the features which gave importance" to the case, but admonished it that they brought a challenge to a sense of duty and a sense of justice, and that while the enforcement of any law made a "strong call" upon court and jury, it could not "override the obligation of the other call, which is to make sure that no man is found guilty of a crime unless the evidence points to his guilt with the degree of certainty which the law requires."

Again, and we quote the words of the court, "No people is fit to be self-governed whose juries, chosen from among the great body of the people, cannot give due consideration to cases of this kind, and who cannot give to any defendant a fair and impartial trial, and render a just verdict. I know of no greater service an American citizen can perform for his country than to manifest by his attitude in cases of this kind that we are a people who [476] are governed by law, and who follow unswervingly that sense of justice which we should follow. Calling up just that spirit of justice, and breathing its very atmosphere, let us go to a consideration of the real merits of this case."

Did the admonition fulfil the duty of the court, or should the court, as it is intimated, have taken the case from the jury? To do so is sometimes the duty of a court, but it is to be remembered a jury is a tribunal constituted by law as the court is, its function has as definite sanction as that of the court, and it alone is charged with the consideration and decision of the facts of a case. And the duty is of such value as to have been considered worthy of constitutional provision and safeguard. See Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 873, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580.

If it be said this comment is but the expression of commonplaces, we reply that commonplaces are sometimes necessary to be brought forward lest earnestness or interest disregard them and urge too far the supervising power of the court, which, we repeat, is subordinate to that of the jury on questions of fact, and certainly "a rule of reason" cannot be asserted for it upon a mere difference in judgment. All the principles and practices of the law are the other way. May such rule be urged in an appellate court against the concurrence of court and jury in the trial court, or, if there be division in the appellate court, for which view may a satisfaction of the rule be asserted? Passing by presumptions that may be challenged, an answer in this case may be left to the facts. But first as to the law.

The indictment is based on the Espionage Act, and that was addressed to the condition of war, and its restraints are not excessive nor ambiguous.[1] We need not enumerate [477] them. They were directed against conduct—speech or writings—that was designed to obstruct the recruitment or enlistment service, or to weaken or debase the spirit of our armies, causing them, it might be, to operate to defeat, and the immeasurable horror and calamity of it.

[1] "Sec. 3. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to promote the success of its enemies and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully cause

But, simple as the law is, perilous to the country as disobedience to it was, offenders developed, and, when it was exerted against them, challenged it to decision as a violation of the right of free speech assured by the Constitution of the United States. A curious spectacle was presented: that great ordinance of government and orderly liberty was invoked to justify the activities of anarchy or of the enemies of the United States, and by a strange perversion of its precepts it was adduced against itself. In other words and explicitly, though it empowered Congress to declare war, and war is waged with armies, their formation (recruiting or enlisting) could be prevented or impeded, and the morale of the armies when formed could be weakened or debased by question or calumny of the motives of authority, and this could not be made a crime,—that it was an impregnable attribute of free speech upon which no curb could be put. Verdicts and judgments of conviction were the reply to the challenge, and when they were brought here our response to it was unhesitating and direct. We did more than reject the contention: we forestalled all shades of repetition of it, including that in the case at bar. Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 63 L. ed. 470, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247; Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U. S. 204, 63 L. ed. 561, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249; Debs v. United States, 249 U. S. 211, 63 L. ed. 566, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252; Abrams v. United States, decided November 10, 1919, 250 U. S. 616, 63 L. ed. 1173, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 17. That, however, though in some respects retrospect, [478] is a pertinent introduction to the facts of the pending case.

The charges of the indictment were against certain articles or editorials in the newspapers published by defendants in German, and intended to be circulated in families and read by persons who understood that language. The articles were adapted to the situation, and, we may say, allusion and innuendo could be as effective as direct charge, and "coarse or heavy humor," when accompanied by sneering headlines and derision of America's efforts, could have evil influence. And such was the character of the article upon which count three of the indictment was based. It had the following headlines:

"Yankee Bluff."

"Professor Jenny Does Not Take the American Preparations for War Seriously."

"Ambassador Page Assures England That We Will Send Ten Million Men."

The following, with some other comments, was in the body of the article: "The army of ten million and the hundred thousand airships which were to annihilate Germany have proved to be American boasts, which will not stand washing. It was worthy of note how much the Yankees can yell their throats out without spraining their mouths. This is in accord with their spiritual quality. They enjoy a capacity for lying, which is able to conceal to a remarkable degree a lack of thought behind a superfluity of words." Coarse, indeed, this was, and vulgar to us, but it was expected to produce, and, it may be, did produce, a different effect upon its readers. To them its derisive contempt may have been truly descriptive of American feebleness and inability to combat Germany's prowess, and thereby chill and check the ardency of patriotism and make it despair of success, and, in hopelessness, relax energy both in preparation and action. If it and the other articles, which we shall presently refer to, [479] had not that purpose, what purpose had they? Were they the mere expression of peevish discontent,—aimless, vapid, and innocuous? We cannot so conclude. We must take them at their word, as the jury did, and ascribe to them a more active and sinister purpose. They were the publications of a newspaper, deliberately prepared, systematic, always of the same trend, more specific in some instances, it may be, than in others. Their effect on the persons affected could not be shown, nor was it necessary. The tendency of the articles and their efficacy were enough for offense,—their "intent" and "attempt," for those are the words of the or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall wilfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished. . . ." [Act of June 15, 1917, 40 Stat. at L. 219, chap. 30, Comp. Stat. § 10,212C, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 120.]

law, and to have required more would have made the law useless. It was passed in precaution. The incidence of its violation might not be immediately seen, evil appearing only in disaster, the result of the disloyalty engendered and the spirit of mutiny.

The article was preceded by one July 4, 1917, headed, "For the Fourth of July," in which it was declared that "the Fourth of July celebration, which has long been an empty formality, will this year become a miserable farce." England was represented as the enemy of the United States, carrying a hostility watchful of opportunity from the time of the Revolution through all crises until the United States "had become so strong that nothing could be undertaken against her." And further: "The ruling classes of England have always despised and hated the United States, and to-day, while they flatter them, they still cherish the same feeling toward them." The emphasis of a paragraph was given to the statement that "under Wilson's régime the United States" had "sprung to the side of England as its savior in time of need. They provided it with means to carry on the war and when that wasn't enough, they sprang into the war themselves. History will sometime pronounce its judgment upon this."

The aid so asserted to have been rendered to England by President Wilson was represented to have been in [480] opposition to the wishes of the people, expressed "by the unwillingness of their (the United States) young men to offer themselves as volunteers for the war. But it will not rest there. The call for peace will come from the masses and will demand to be heard. And the sooner the better. No blood has been shed yet, no hate or bitterness has yet arisen against Germany, who has never done this country any harm, but has sent millions of her sons for its upbuilding. The sooner the American people come to their senses and demand peace, the better and more honorable it will be for this country."

The animus of the article and the effect expected of it need no comment to display. It was followed, supplemented, we may say, and reinforced by another article July 7, 1917. It (the latter) had for headlines the words "Failure of Recruiting," and recruiting failed, was its representation, notwithstanding an "advertising campaign was worked at high pressure" and "all sorts of means were tried to stir up patriotism." Its further declaration was that "Germany was represented as a violator of all human rights and all international law, yet all in vain. Neither the resounding praises nor the obviously false accusations against Germany were of any avail. The recruits did not materialize." The cause was represented to be "that the American who was not a coward" did "not care to allow himself to be shot to satisfy British lust for the mastery of the world." And "the people instinctively recognized and felt" that "the pro-British policy of the government is an error, which can bring nothing but injury upon this country." It was then added that "the nation, therefore," was doing the only thing it could still do, "since its desires were not consulted at first." It refused "to take part."

The purpose is manifest, however the statements of the article may be estimated, whether as criminal means—violations of law,—or the exercise of free speech and of the [481] press. And its statements were deliberate and wilfully false, the purpose being to represent that the war was not demanded by the people, but was the result of the machinations of executive power, and thus to arouse resentment to it and what it would demand of ardor and effort. In final comment we may say that the article in effect justified the German aggressions.

We do not deem it necessary to adduce the other charges of the indictment. We may, however, refer to the plausibility of the excuse of the alteration of Senator La Follette's speech, and remark that it disappears when the speech is considered in connection with the articles that preceded and followed it. The alterations were, it is true, of two words only, but words of different import than those the Senator used. The Senator urged that the burden of taxation made necessary by the war be imposed upon those who might profit by the war, in order to relieve those who might suffer by it and be brought to "bread lines." The article changed the words to "bread riots;" that is, changed the expression of acceptance of what might come as a consequence of the war, to turbulent resistance to it, and thus giving the article the character of the others, with a definite illustration of the opposition to the war by a Senator and his prophecy of a riotous protest by the people. It will be recalled that in other articles the antagonism of the people to the war was declared, and in one of them it was said that the war was commenced "under Wilson's régime" and "without their (the people's) consent."

In conclusion we may add that there are in the record what are called "intent" articles which supplement and emphasize the charges of the indictment, and it is to be remembered that defendants were witnesses and had the opportunity of explanation, and to preclude any misapprehension of the German originals or defect in their translation. And the jury could judge of the defendants by their presence.

[482] We have not deemed it necessary to consider the articles commented on with reference to the verdicts; the Abrams Case has made it unnecessary. On any count of which any defendant was convicted he could have been sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. The highest sentence on any defendant was five years.

Further comment is unnecessary, and our conclusion is that the judgment must be affirmed as to Werner, Darkow, and Lemke, but reversed as to Schaefer and Vogel; as to them the case is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

So ordered.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the following opinion, in which Mr. Justice Holmes concurred:

With the opinion and decision of this court reversing the judgment against Schaefer and Vogel on the ground that there was no evidence legally connecting them with the publication I concur fully. But I am of opinion that the judgments against the other three defendants should also be reversed because either the demurrers to the several counts should have been sustained, or a verdict should have been directed for each defendant on all of the counts.

The extent to which Congress may, under the Constitution, interfere with free speech, was in Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 52, 63 L. ed. 470, 473, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247, declared by a unanimous court to be this: "The question in every case is whether the words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree."

This is a rule of reason. Correctly applied, it will preserve the right of free speech both from suppression by tyrannous, well-meaning majorities, and from abuse by irresponsible, fanatical minorities. Like many other rules for human conduct, it can be applied correctly only by the [483] exercise of good judgment; and to the exercise of good judgment, calmness is, in times of deep feeling and on subjects which excite passion, as essential as fearlessness and honesty. The question whether, in a particular instance, the words spoken or written fall within the permissible curtailment of free speech, is, under the rule enunciated by this court, one of degree. And because it is a question of degree, the field in which the jury may exercise its judgment is, necessarily, a wide one. But its field is not unlimited. The trial provided for is one by judge and jury; and the judge may not abdicate his function. If the words were of such a nature and were used under such circumstances that men, judging in calmness, could not reasonably say that they created a clear and present danger that they would bring about the evil which Congress sought and had a right to prevent, then it is the duty of the trial judge to withdraw the case from the consideration of the jury; and if he fails to do so, it is the duty of the appellate court to correct the error. In my opinion, no jury acting in calmness could reasonably say that any of the publications set forth in the indictment was of such a character or was made under such circumstances as to create a clear and present danger either that they would obstruct recruiting, or that they would promote the success of the enemies of the United States. That they could have interfered with the military or naval forces of the United States or have caused insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in its military or naval services was not even suggested; and there was no evidence of conspiracy except the co-operation of editors and business manager in issuing the publications complained of.

The nature and possible effect of a writing cannot be properly determined by culling here and there a sentence and presenting it separated from the context. In making such determination, it should be read as a whole; at least, if it is short, like these news items and editorials. Sometimes [484] it is necessary to consider, in connection with it, other evidence which may enlarge or otherwise control its meaning, or which may show that it was circulated under circumstances which gave it a peculiar significance or effect. But no such evidence was introduced by the government.

The writings here in question must speak for themselves. Fifteen publications were set forth in the indictment; and others were introduced in evidence. To reproduce all of them would unduly prolong this opinion. Four are selected which will illustrate the several contentions of the government. That at least three of these four were deemed by it of special importance is shown by the fact that each of the three was made the subject of a separate count.

First: There were convictions on three counts of wilfully obstructing the recruiting and enlistment service. The conviction of the news editor of so obstructing rested wholly upon his having inserted the following reprint from a Berlin paper in the Tageblatt:

Yankee Bluff.

Professor Jenny Does Not Take the American Preparations for War Seriously.

Ambassador Page Assures England That We Will Send Ten Million Men.

London, Aug. 5.—Ambassador Page followed Lloyd George at Guild Hall in Plymouth, with a great speech. He declares there that the differences between England and the United States in former times were only of a superficial nature, and that both peoples are now united inseparably, to fight for freedom and against the hydra of militarism. He assures his hearers that the United States is ready for all sacrifices in order to end the war victoriously, and that if necessary it will send ten million men to France.

Berlin, Aug. 5.—In the "Täglishe Rundschau," Professor Jenny writes under the title "Americanism" as [485] follows:—Americans think in exaggerations and talk in superlatives. Even Ambassador Andrew White in his Memoirs falls into superlatives in comparatively insignificant cases. He speaks of them as the most important events of his life and maintains that certain people have made an indelible impression on him, whom others consider to be ordinary, average men.

The army of ten million men has dwindled to a voluntary army of 120,000; while the new conscripted army of 565,000 will not even be ready to begin drilling for the front in six months. The hundred thousand airships were reduced to 20,000 and then to 3,000, which the Americans hope to have ready for next summer if they find the right model for them. As for the thousands of ships that were to be sent across the ocean, America, six months after the declaration of war, has not yet decided whether they are to be wood or steel ships; so far not even the keel of one ship has been laid. It amounts to this, that now when the Americans can scrape some tonnage together, the troops are not ready, and when they have the troops ready, the tonnage will not be available.

The army of ten million and the hundred thousand airships which were to annihilate Germany, have proved to be American boasts which will not stand washing. It is worthy to note how much the Yankees can yell their throats out without spraining their mouths. This is in accord with their spiritual quality. They enjoy a capacity for lying, which is able to conceal to a remarkable degree a lack of thought behind a superfluity of words.

But some fine day, if they do not stop their boasting and bluffing, it might happen to them that they get the lockjaw, for which there is no better relief than a good box on the ear. Moreover it is not to be assumed that the Americans are really in earnest with the war. No one would be surprised if they found a thousand and one excuses for taking no active part in the European War.

[486] It is not apparent on a reading of this article—which is not unlike many reprints from the press of Germany to which our patriotic societies gave circulation in order to arouse the American fighting spirit—how it could rationally be held to tend even remotely or indirectly to obstruct recruiting. But as this court has declared, and as Professor Chafee has shown in his "Freedom of Speech in War Time," 32 Harvard L. Rev. 932, 963, the test to be applied—as in the case of criminal attempts and incitements—is not the remote or possible effect. There must be the clear and present danger. Certainly men judging in calmness and with his test presented to them could not reasonably have said that this coarse and heavy humor immediately threatened the success of recruiting. Compare United States v. Hall, 248 Fed. 150; United States v. Schutte, 252 Fed. 212; Von Bank v. United States, 165 C. C. A. 267, 253 Fed. 641; Balbas v. United States, 168 C. C. A. 229, 257 Fed. 17; Sandberg v. United States, 168 C. C. A. 593, 257 Fed. 643; Kammann v. United States, 170 C. C. A. 260, 259 Fed. 192; Wolf v. United States, 170 C. C. A. 364, 259 Fed. 388, 391, 392.

Second: There were convictions on three counts of wilfully conveying false reports and statements with intent to promote the success of the enemies of the United States. The Tageblatt, like many of the smaller newspapers, was without a foreign or a national news service of any kind and did not purport to have any. It took such news usually from items appearing in some other paper theretofore published in the German or the English language. It did not in any way indicate the source of its news. The item, if taken from the English press, was, of course, translated. Sometimes it was copied in full; sometimes in part only; and sometimes it was rewritten; or editorial comment was added. The government did not attempt to prove that any statement made in any of the news items published in the Tageblatt was false in fact. Its evidence, [487] under each count, was limited to showing that the item as published therein varied in some particular from the item as it appeared in the paper from which it had been copied; and no attempt was made to prove the original despatch to the latter paper. The government contended that solely because of variation from the item copied it was a false report, although the item in the Tageblatt did not purport to reproduce an item from another paper, and in no way indicated the source of the news. Each of the three items following illustrates a different method by which the variation was effected:

1. The publication for which the news editor was convicted on the fifth count by reason of an addition to the item copied:

(The translation of the Tageblatt item as set forth in the indictment.)

Further Economies.

Amsterdam, September 2.—It has been reported here that permission to export the wheat and flour on the ships held in New York has been refused. Information to this effect is contained in an official proclamation of the latest cut in bread rations and of the need for economy which has reached the civil authorities. This document says: "We know now with certainty that we cannot count upon the import of breadstuffs from America and that we must strive to make our own provisions suffice. In initiated circles it is said that under no conditions can the new American proposal be accepted, and that the foodstuffs may rot before the ships will be unloaded."

(The original Tageblatt item as set forth in the indictment.)

Weitere Einschränkungen.

Amsterdam, 2. Sept. Es wird hier gemeldet, daß der Export von Weizen und Mehl auf den in New York zurückgehaltenen Schiffen verweigert wurde. Eine diesbezügliche Mittheilung ist in einer amtlichen Erklärung der jüngsten Brotrationen-Verringerung und der Aufforderung zur Einschränkung enthalten, welche den Gemeindebehörden zuging. In derselben heißt es: „Wir wissen nun bestimmt, daß wir auf die Einfuhr von Brotgetreide aus Amerika nicht rechnen können, und daß wir uns bemühen müssen, mit den eigenen Vorräthen auszukommen." — In eingeweihten Kreisen heißt es, daß man auf den neuen Vorschlag Amerikas unter keinen Umständen eingehen und das Getreide eher verfaulen lassen wird, als die Schiffe auszuladen.

[488] The falsification charged is said to consist in having added to the despatch which was copied from the Staatszeitung the words: "In initiated circles it is said that under no conditions can the new American proposal be accepted, and that the foodstuffs may rot before the ships will be unloaded." But it is obvious, upon comparing the English translation with the German original, that the defendant did no such thing. What occurred was this: The sentence referred to was not made a part of the despatch in the Tageblatt. It followed the despatch; it was not within the quotation marks; and was separated from it by a dash;—a usual method of indicating that what follows is comment or an addition made by the editor. In the English translation, as set forth in the indictment, this sentence, through some inadvertence of the government's translator or draftsman, was included as part of the despatch and brought with the quotation therein. Evidently both the jury and the trial judge failed to examine the German original.

2. One of the publications for which the news editor was convicted on the first count because of an omission from the item copied:

Ready for the Fray?

St. Petersburg, September 7th.—The Russian Baltic fleet will defend Kronstadt and Reval, and through them the Russian capital itself. The commanders of the two fortresses have made this report to the provisional government. A large part of the Baltic fleet was under control of the Maximalists who hitherto have opposed Kerensky. The commanders of Sveaborg and Helsingfors have also telegraphed their assurance to the government that the Baltic fleet has expressed its willingness to offer desperate resistance, in case the Germans should make a naval attack upon the strongholds between Riga and the capital.

Investigation of the Fall of Riga.

The Russians devastated the land through which [439] they retreated from Riga in order to impede the German advance. Roads were broken up, bridges destroyed, and provisions burned. A special commission has been set up by Premier Kerensky to investigate the fall of Riga. As far as reports have so far been permitted to appear, it is established that only two regiments gave up their positions without fighting, and the others offered the attacking Germans bold resistance. The retreat was carried out in an orderly manner, in spite of pursuit by the German armies. The first of these, advancing along the coast in the region of Dunaburg, is apparently endeavoring to reach Berna, on the Gulf of Riga. The second German army is pressing along the Pskoff road to execute a turning movement, while the third is energetically pushing in a northeasterly direction against Ostroff. The Germans are showing signs of nervousness in advancing through this marshy lake-strewn country, which are increased by the Russian resistance.

The falsification here is said to consist in the omission from the end of the first paragraph of the following sentence, which appeared in the paper from which the item was taken: "From this it can be concluded that the fall of Riga has united the opposing political factions in Russia."

3. The publication for which the news editor was convicted on the sixth count because of the change of a word in the item copied:

War of the Rich.

Senator La Follette Thinks They Ought Not to Make a Cent of Profit.

Hot Fight in the Senate Over Increased Taxation of War Profits.

Washington, August 21.—Taxation of riches in such a measure that the burdens of the cost of the war will be taken from the shoulders of the poor man was recommended to-day in the Senate by Senator La Follette in a long speech. He declared that the proposed two billion [490] dollar bill as drawn up in the Senate's Committee on Financial Affairs is impractical because it covers less than 17 per cent of the war expenses of the first year and from this would result the necessity of issuing bonds for billions of dollars. Bonds, however, mean the same as an increased cost of living, and one of the consequences would be that next winter bread riots could be expected in the big cities. He recommended the acceptance of amendments by which further taxation of large incomes and big war profits would be effected, which would bring the total amount of the bill to about $3,500,000,000.

Senator La Follette declared that wealth had never, in any war, offered itself on the altar of patriotism. He attacked the proposed issue of bonds and prophesied that the Liberty bonds would eventually find their way into the hands of the rich, if they had not already done so. "But," he continued, "this is not all, for war, and principally the sale of bonds, leads inevitably to inflation. This raises prices and through that the cost of living for the great mass of people is raised. Reason and experience teach us that the policy of financing a war for the most part by borrowing the necessary money is in itself one of the worst financial burdens that war imposes upon men. But wealth is always a powerful factor in the government. It fattens on war loans and war contracts as well as on speculation, which is not wanting in time of war. Upon these grounds the rich are always in favor of war, and when they have succeeded in bringing on a war, they are often powerful enough with ministers of war and parliaments and congresses to force the maximum of loans and to reduce taxation to a minimum by every possible intrigue and argument.

"And that is the case with us in this war. Within thirty days after the declaration of war wealth had precipitated us into bond issues of unheard-of size. Morgan came to the city, the press urged it, the administration [491] commanded it, and Congress authorized the issue of five billions of untaxable government bonds and two billions of interest-bearing Treasury notes."

Senator La Follette attacked the program of the administration under which a new tax measure will be introduced next winter. "Of what use is the postponement?" he asked. "Whose interest is served if taxes on incomes and war profits are kept down and the masses are delivered over to the money lenders as security for an enormous and wickedly disproportionate issue of bonds?" He insisted that the policy of financing the war should at once be decided upon.

"To-day the way is clear," he explained; "hesitation to provide now for heavy taxes would not be a mistake, it would be something worse."

Senator La Follette reviewed the financial history of previous American wars. "We must not repeat such mistakes," he said; "it would be blind madness if we did not learn from the mistakes that were made in previous wars. A mistake that we make now may be fatal. It would certainly cost us untold millions of dollars and thousands upon thousands of lives, as by it we would prolong the war unnecessarily.

"As long as one man can be found who makes war profits, I am in favor of taking away in taxes such part of those profits as the government requires, and the government needs the whole of such profits before adding a penny to the taxation of people who are already staggering under heavy burdens by reason of the higher prices occasioned by the war. This may be a new principle in war financing, but it is the least that one can do for the mass of the people, and it is considerably less than simple justice would demand for them.

"The great mass of the people bear the costs of war, although they may not be directly taxed one dollar. The great mass of the people pay in higher prices and prolonged [492] hours of labor. They pay in service, not alone on the battle field, but wherever men and women work hard all day long. But more than all this, they pay the cost of war with their blood and their lives, and what is the greatest sacrifice of all, with the blood and lives of their loved ones.

"If bread lines are a familiar sight in every city in the land, as they undoubtedly will be if the present prices of the most necessary supplies for living hold firm during the coming winter, if cold and hunger become daily guests with thousands of families who, until now, have only known comfort, a condition which is certain to come about during the coming winter months if no help against the present level of prices can be found, then it is my opinion that the members of this Congress will do little enough if they come to realize that they are adding to the privations and pains of the mass of the people if they hesitate to place even a fairly moderate portion of the financial burden upon the rich."

Falsification is charged solely because the word "Brot-riots" (translated as "bread-riots") was used in the eleventh line of the article instead of the word "Brodreihen" (translated as "bread lines").

The act punishes the wilful making and conveying of "false reports and false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies." Congress sought thereby to protect the American people from being wilfully misled to the detriment of their cause by one actuated by the intention to further the cause of the enemy. Wilfully untrue statements which might mislead the people as to the financial condition of the government and thereby embarrass it; as to the adequacy of the preparations for war or the support of the forces; as to the sufficiency of the food supply; or wilfully untrue statements or reports of military operations [493] which might mislead public opinion as to the competency of the Army or Navy or its leaders (see "The Relation between the Army and the Press in War Time," War College Publication, 1916); or wilfully untrue statements or reports which might mislead officials in the execution of the law, or military authorities in the disposition of the forces. Such is the kind of false statement, and the only kind which, under any rational construction, is made criminal by the act. Could the military and naval forces of the United States conceivably have been interfered with or the success of the enemy conceivably have been promoted by any of the three publications set forth above? Surely, neither the addition to the first, nor the omission from the second, constituted the making of a false statement or report. The mistranslation of "bread lines" in one passage of the third, if it can be deemed a false report, obviously could not have promoted the success of our enemies. The other publications set out in the indictment were likewise impotent to produce the evil against which the statute aimed.

Darkow, the news editor, and Werner, the editor, were each sentenced to five years in the penitentiary; Lemke, the business manager, to two years. The jury which found men guilty for publishing news items or editorials like those here in question must have supposed it to be within their province to condemn men not merely for disloyal acts, but for a disloyal heart; provided only that the disloyal heart was evidenced by some utterance. To prosecute men for such publications reminds of the days when men were hanged for constructive treason. And, indeed, the jury may well have believed from the charge that the Espionage Act [June 15, 1917, 40 Stat. at L. 217, chap. 30, Comp. Stat. § 10,212a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 120] had in effect restored the crime of constructive treason.[1] To hold that such harmless additions [494] to or omissions from news items, and such impotent expressions of editorial opinion, as were shown here, can afford the basis even of a prosecution, will doubtless discourage criticism of the policies of the government. To hold that such publications can be suppressed as false reports subjects to new perils the constitutional liberty of the press, already seriously curtailed in practice under powers assumed to have been conferred upon the postal authorities. Nor will this grave danger end with the passing [495] of the war. The constitutional right of free speech has been declared to be the same in peace and in war. In peace, too, men may differ widely as to what loyalty to our country demands; and an intolerant majority, swayed by passion or by fear, may be prone in the future, as it has often been in the past, to stamp as disloyal opinions with which it disagrees. Convictions such as these, besides abridging freedom of speech, threaten freedom of thought and of belief.

Mr. Justice Clarke, dissenting:

On a single indictment, containing nine counts, five men, Peter Schaefer, Paul Vogel, Louis Werner, Martin Darkow, and Herman Lemke, were convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for printing seventeen articles, in a German language newspaper, published at Philadelphia, between June 24 and September 17, 1917.

Schaefer was president and Vogel was treasurer of the company which published the paper, but their entire time was given to the service of labor unions, which had loaned money to the company, and they were given these official

[1] The presiding judge, in charging the jury, said of the act: ". . . its general purpose is to protect our military strength and efficiency, to protect ourselves against anything which would promote the success of our enemies by undermining our morale, lessening our will to win, or, as it is generally expressed, our will to conquer . . . creating divisions among our people . . .

"These acts which are prohibited are treasonable in the sense in which that word is used in the common speech of the people. Indeed, they may constitute legal treason as defined in some jurisdictions, but they are not treason against the United States, for the simple reason that there is a provision in our Constitution (which, of course, the acts of Congress follow) that treason against the United States—you will observe that it does not say 'treason generally,' but treason against the United States—shall consist only in making war upon them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort, and there is another provision to the effect that no person shall be convicted of the crime of treason unless there are two witnesses to the same overt act, making, as you will see, it perfectly clear that mere words, whether published or not, as long as they are mere words, do not constitute the crime of treason, but they must be words uttered and published under such circumstances as to become deeds or acts in themselves, as 'words' may be. So that words, unless there is something to which they may attach, and unless the direct, natural, and reasonably to be expected consequences of them would be to aid the enemy, do not constitute the crime of treason. Every man will observe, however, that even mere words may be fraught with consequences which, although too remote to constitute the crime of treason, may nevertheless be words which are fraught with most awful consequences . . . and that therefore it is properly within the province of the law to prohibit . . . and make it a crime even to utter them. This is, in substance, what the law does. Congress could not call some mere words treason, because the Constitution prohibits it; but there is no constitutional limitation on the power of Congress to declare those things a crime against the law which Congress has done in this act. . . ."

positions for the purpose of enabling them to keep informed as to its business progress and the disposition of its earnings.

All the members of the court agree that there was no substantial evidence that Schaefer or Vogel were in any respect responsible for the publications complained of, and that as to them the judgment must be reversed.

In this conclusion I cordially concur, but I go further and am clear that a similar reversal should be entered as to Herman Lemke, who was convicted, as Schaefer and Vogel were, on only one of the nine counts of the indictment.

Lemke was given the sounding title of "business manager," but, as a matter of fact, he was a mere bookkeeper, [496] of a small business, with very limited authority. The newspaper led a precarious financial existence and Lemke's duties were restricted to making out and collecting bills for advertising and circulation, to paying some bills, and to turning over the remainder of the money, if any remained, to the treasurer, Vogel. Lemke himself and two or three other witnesses testified that he had nothing whatever to do with deciding what should be published in the newspaper, and that he never wrote for it excepting that, when a reporter was ill, he occasionally reported a concert. There was no evidence to the contrary.

On such a record it is very clear that a man holding such a position as Lemke held could not, and did not, have anything to do with determining what should be published in the paper. He had no more to do with the policy of the paper than a porter would have with determining the policy of a railroad company. In my judgment the failure of proof as to Lemke was as complete as it was to Schaefer and Vogel, and I cannot share in permitting him to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a year for publications which he was powerless either to authorize or prevent.

A different case is made against Werner and Darkow. Werner was a writer of political editorials for the paper, and Darkow was the news editor. Werner was found guilty on four counts and not guilty on five. Darkow was found guilty on five counts and not guilty on four.

Two of the articles written, or caused to be published, by Werner, and one, or perhaps two, of those caused to be published by Darkow, were of a character such that they might have been fairly convicted of violating the act under which they were indicted, but none of these articles was included in count one, and only one of them was included in count nine, and with respect to this one article in count nine Werner was found not guilty when charged with its publication in count three. The charge of the court did [497] not distinguish between these really offending publications and the many innocent ones the publication of which was charged to be criminal, with the result that it failed to give such direction to the deliberations of the jury as I think every person accused of crime is entitled to have given.

The denial of separate motions to instruct the jury to render a verdict of not guilty as to Werner and Darkow on the first and ninth counts seems to me to constitute error so fundamental and pervasive as to render the entire trial unfair and unjust, to a degree which requires the granting of a new trial to each of them.

I shall state my reasons for this conclusion as briefly as I may.

The first count charges that the defendants "knowingly, wilfully, and unlawfully made and conveyed false reports and statements, with intent to promote the success of the enemy of the United States, to wit, the Imperial German Government."

The indictment and the record in general make it very plain that the district attorney, in framing the indictment, and during the trial, believed that the statute prohibiting the making and conveying of a false report and statement would be violated by the publication of any article which had been published elsewhere if, in the publication, it was changed, either by addition or omission, and this without any proof that the original publication was true and the second publication false, and seemingly without regard to whether or not the publication had any tendency to promote the success of the enemy. The trial court accepted this construction of the statute and submitted the first count to the jury on this theory of the law.

I cannot doubt that this was gravely erroneous, for the real purpose of the statute is to punish published, not suppressed, reports and statements, whether original or [498] copies, made with the intent to promote the success, and which were of a nature reasonably likely to promote the success, of the enemy of the United States, by discouraging our own people or encouraging the enemy.

The first of the thirteen false reports which it is charged in the first count were published, is typical of the others, and will sufficiently explain my position.

It purported to be a despatch from London, and, translated, reads as follows:

The Crisis.

Is Advancing in Russia with Rapid Strides. The Coalition Government Will Probably Not Last Long.

Its Position in Foreign Affairs Is Condemned.

London, June 23.—The Petrograd correspondent of the Chronicle telegraphs to-day that a great crisis is in progress in Russia. (By that he means apparently that the unstable and weak coalition government will soon be got rid of. It seems to obey unwillingly the instructions of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council to request the allies to revise their war aims. The workmen will not stand for this much longer. It is highly significant too that not a word has been reported for four days about the great general congress of the Workmen's and Soldiers' delegates; apparently because its behavior does not please the allies.)

The correspondent of the Chronicle quotes an extract from Maxim Gorky's newspaper "New Life" which says that people all over the world are to understand that Russia rejects the aggressive war aims of the allies. The correspondent sees a sign in this that the Socialists of Russia will not wait much longer.

Obviously there is nothing in this, as published, which could either discourage Americans or encourage the German enemy, and the indictment does not claim that there is. That which the indictment charges makes the publication criminally false is that there was omitted from it "a [499] proposal by Maxim Gorky that Russia wage a separate war against Germany." Thus the charge is that the crime consisted not in publishing something which tended to encourage German enemies, but in omitting to publish something which it is conceived might have discouraged them. It is not charged that what was printed was harmful, but that something which was unfavorable to Germany was not published.

This is characteristic of all but two of the thirteen articles in the first count, and to these, additions were made so inconsequential as in my judgment not to deserve notice.

It seems to me very clear that the statute could not be violated by publishing reports and statements harmless in themselves, and which were not shown to be false, merely because they had been published in a different form in another paper,—and this is the extent to which the proof in this case goes as to all of the publications complained of in the first count. Without more discussion, I am so clear that the requested instruction for the defendants Werner and Darkow as to the first count should have been granted, that I think the refusal of it entitles them to a new trial.

The ninth count consists of a charge of conspiracy on the part of the entire five defendants to wilfully make and convey false reports and false statements with intent to interfere with the operation and success of the military and naval forces of the United States; with wilfully causing and attempting to cause insubordination, disloyalty, and mutiny in the military and naval forces of the United States, and with wilfully obstructing the recruiting and enlisting service of the United States by the publication of various articles referred to, but not quoted, in the indictment. With a single exception these articles are the same as those incorporated in the first count, and this exception purported to be a despatch from the Hague, giving the [500] reasons for the unrest in Germany, from which it is charged there was omitted a statement that one of the reasons for such unrest was the failure of the submarine campaign carried on by the German government. Even in this ninth count it is not charged that the publications as actually made were harmful, but it proceeds, as does the first count, upon the implication that they might have been more discouraging than they were to the German enemy if the omitted statements had been incorporated into them, and that for this reason they violated the statute. In other words, it comes to this: that the ninth count charges as criminal, not a conspiracy to publish the articles complained of, which were innocent, but a conspiracy to suppress certain statements which were published in other newspapers in connection with or as a part of the published articles, and which, it is argued, might have been harmful to the German cause if they had been published. It is impossible for me to think that the statute could be violated in any such manner.

It was clearly proved that the newspaper was so poor financially that it was not able to have telegraphic service of any character, and, morning paper that it was, it filled its news columns with clippings from the evening papers of the night before and from early editions of the morning papers when it could procure them before its hour for going to press. It did not print nearly as many columns as the newspapers from which it obtained its news, and for this reason it was necessarily obliged to cut and condense, both headlines and the body of the articles. In several of the instances complained of these exigencies of publication plainly caused the omissions complained of.

Convinced as I am that the requested instructions to the jury that Werner and Darkow could not be found guilty on the first and ninth counts should have been given, and that the charge of the court was so utterly unadapted to the case as it would have been if they had been [501] given, as to be valueless or worse as a direction to the jury, I think that the least that can be done, in the interest of the orderly administration of justice, is to grant a new trial and let a new jury, properly instructed, pass upon the case.

I cannot see, as my associates seem to see, that the disposition of this case involves a great peril either to the maintenance of law and order and governmental authority, on the one hand, or to the freedom of the press, on the other. To me it seems simply a case of flagrant mistrial, likely to result in disgrace and great injustice, probably in life imprisonment for two old men, because this court hesitates to exercise the power, which it undoubtedly possesses, to correct, in this calmer time, errors of law which would not have been committed but for the stress and strain of feeling prevailing in the early months of the late deplorable war.

CARBON STEEL COMPANY, Petitioner,
v.
C. G. LEWELLYN, Collector of Internal Revenue.

Internal revenue — munitions tax — who is manufacturer.

1. A corporation which, having contracted to manufacture and deliver to a foreign government high explosive shells, enters into contracts with others for the performance of the necessary operations to produce a completed shell, doing none of the work itself except the manufacturing of steel in bar form suitable for the shells, and the furnishing its subcontractors with certain other materials such as "transit plugs," "fixing screws," and "copper tubing," is subject to the munitions manufacturers' tax imposed by the Act of September 8, 1916, § 301, upon every person manufacturing projectiles, shells, or torpedoes of any kind.

Internal revenue — munitions tax — manufacturers and subcontractors.

2. The question whether the subcontractors of a corporation which has contracted to manufacture and deliver to a foreign government high explosive shells were correctly assessed under the munitions tax imposed by the Act of September 8, 1916, § 301, does not concern the corporation in its efforts to resist such a tax on the profits made by it.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania in favor of defendant in a suit to recover back a munition manufacturer's tax paid under protest. Affirmed.

See same case below, 169 C. C A. 473, 258 Fed. 533.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. V. Blaxter argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Frederick De C. Faust and Henry O'Neill, filed a brief for petitioner:

The statute levies an excise tax.

The absence of any definition of "manufacturing" implies its ordinary acceptation.

Dewey v. United States, 178 U. S. 510, 44 L. ed. 1170, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 981; United States v. Wigglesworth, 2 Story. 369, Fed. Cas. No. 16,690.

The provisions of statutes levying taxes will not be extended by implication. In cases of doubt the construction will be in favor of the citizen.

Assistant Attorney General Frierson argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Petitioner brought this action against Lewellyn, who is collector of internal revenue for the 23d district of Pennsylvania, to recover the sum of $271,062.62, with interest from December 29, 1917, paid to him, under a demand made by him as collector, for an excise tax assessed under § 301 of title III. of the Act of September 8, 1916 [39 Stat. at L. 781, chap. 463, Comp. Stat. § 6336¼b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 350], known as munition manufacturers' tax.

Petitioner made a verified return under protest, reciting its belief that the tax should be abated for the following reasons: (1) It, petitioner, did not manufacture munitions; (2) the munitions taxed were manufactured by certain independent contractors; (3) the profit derived by petitioner was from the sale of the munitions, not from their manufacture.

The tax was not abated and petitioner paid it under protest.

[503] The facts are stipulated: Petitioner, through its president, who went to England, entered into three contracts with the British government, dated, respectively, January 26, September 29, and October 7, 1915, for the manufacture and delivery f. a. s. New York, of a certain number of high explosive shells.

The work to complete the shells consisted of the following operations: (1) Obtaining suitable steel in bar form: (2) cutting or breaking the bars to proper length; (3) converting the bars or slugs into a hollow shell forging by means of a hydraulic press; (4) turning the shell upon a lathe to exact dimensions; (5) closing one end of the forging to form the nose of the shell; (6) drilling out the case of the shell and inserting a base plate; (7) threading the nose of the shell and inserting the nose bushing, and inserting in the nose bushing a wooden plug to protect the thread thereof; (8) cutting a groove around the circumference of the shell and inserting thereon a copper driving band, and turning the band to required dimensions; (9) varnishing, greasing, and crating the completed shell.

Petitioner was not equipped, nor did it have facilities, for doing any of the described work except the manufacture of steel suitable for the shells in bar form, and, therefore, to procure the manufacture of the shells, it, petitioner, did certain work and entered into numerous contracts in relation to the various steps in making a completed shell.

These steps are not necessary to give. The question in the case is not a broad one, and all of the details of the stipulation are not necessary to its decision. The essential elements of fact we have given, and whether they bring petitioner within the Munitions Tax Act we shall proceed to consider.

The act is as follows: "Sec. 301. (1) That every person manufacturing . . . ; (c) projectiles, shells, or torpedoes of any kind . . . ; or (f) any part of any of the articles mentioned . . . ; (c) . . . shall pay [504] for each taxable year, in addition to the income tax imposed by title I., an excise tax of twelve and one half per centum upon the entire net profits actually received or accrued for said year from the sale or disposition of such articles manufactured within the United States: . . ."

The act is explicit in its declaration; perplexity and controversy come over its application. One must be a "person manufacturing" to incur the tax, but who is to be regarded as such person in the sense of the act? Or, to put it another way, when is "manufacturing" (the word of the act) done, and when is "manufactured" (the word of the act) attained? In elucidation of the words, the specifications enumerate nine operations to produce a shell; that is, a completed shell (except for explosive charge and detonating device), such as petitioner contracted to deliver to the British government. And all of the operations are asserted to be necessary, and all must be performed seemingly by the same person in order that he may be designated as a "person manufacturing." We put aside, for the purpose of testing the contention, the provision of the act making a person manufacturing "any part of any of the articles mentioned" subject to "a tax."

The contention reduces the act to a practical nullity on account of the ease of its evasion. Besides, petitioner minimizes what it did. It was the contractor for the delivery of shells, made the profits on them, and the profits necessarily reimbursed all expenditures on account of the shells. It was such profits that the act was intended to reach,—profits made out of the war and taxed to defray the expense of the war. Or, as expressed by the court of appeals, Congress "felt that the large abnormal profits incident to these war contracts created a remunerative field for temporary taxation." Petitioner, it is true, used the services of others, but they were services necessary to the discharge of its obligations and to the acquisition of the profits of such discharge. And petitioner kept control [505] throughout, —never took its hands off, was at pains to express the fact, and retained its ownership of all of the materials furnished by it, and the completed shell belonged to it until delivered to the British government. And further, the steel furnished by it was advanced above a crude state—advanced to slugs. The nicking by an outside company we consider of no consequence, for after nicking they were redelivered to petitioner and by it "broken or separated" into slugs.

And petitioner supplied its respective subcontractors with other materials,— "transit plugs," "fixing screws," and "copper tubing." It is, of course, the contention of petitioner that this was furnishing, not manufacturing, and that the literal meaning of words can be insisted on in resistance to a taxing statute. We recognize the rule of construction, but it cannot be carried to reduce the statute to empty declarations. And, as we have already said, petitioner's contention would so reduce it. How universal must the manufacturing be? Will the purchase of an elemental part destroy it? And how subsidiary must the work of the subcontractor be not to relieve the contractor—take from him the character of a "person manufacturing"? And such is the tangle of inquiries we encounter when we undertake to distinguish between what a contractor to deliver a thing does himself, and what he does through others as subsidiary to his obligation.

It is, after all, but a question of the kind or degree of agency,—the difference, to use counsel's words, between "servants and general agents" and "brokers, dealers, middlemen, or factors." And this distinction between the agents counsel deems important, and expresses it another way, as follows: "'Every person manufacturing' means the person doing the actual work individually, or through servants or general agents, and that the ownership of the material worked upon does not alter this meaning of the word."

[506] We are unable to assent to this meaning of the word. It takes from the act a great deal of utility and makes it miss its purpose. Of course it did not contemplate that "person manufacturing" should use his own hands,—it contemplated the use of other aid and instrumentalities, machinery, servants, and general agents, availing thereby of the world's division of labor, but it contemplated also the world's division of occupations; and, in this comprehensive way, contemplated that all of the world's efficiency might be availed of, and when availed of for profits, the latter could not thereby escape being taxed. And where, indeed, was the hardship of it? The tax was on profits and measured by them.

It is, however, alleged, and the stipulation shows, that the subcontracting companies paid a tax on their profits, and profits were testified to be the difference between what was paid the subcontracting companies for the work and their cost in doing it. And it thus appears, it is urged, that petitioner has been taxed upon the theory that it manufactured the shells, and the contracting companies "have been taxed for actually performing all the manufacturing necessary to complete the same shells."

But it is a sufficient answer to say that the tax here in issue is the tax on the profits of the petitioner, not on the profits of the subcontractors. The question whether such subcontractors were correctly assessed concerns them, and not the petitioner, who is resisting a tax on the profits actually made by him, and none other.

We consider further discussion unnecessary.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Van Devanter dissent.

v.
EPHRAIM LEDERER, Collector of Internal Revenue for the First District of Pennsylvania.

Internal revenue — munitions tax — who is manufacturer.

A corporation which, under inspection in behalf of the French government, made the steel for, and did the forging on, certain shell bodies under an order from another corporation, to enable the latter to carry out its contract with such government for certain explosive shells, was engaged in manufacturing a part of such shells within the meaning of the Munition Manufacturers' Tax Act of September 8, 1916, imposing a tax upon the profits of every person manufacturing projectiles, shells, or torpedoes, or any part of any of such articles.

Shell forgings are not parts of shells according to the Treasury Department's own definition of the word "part," in construing the Revenue Act, and certain of its rulings thereunder.

Treasury Dec. 2384, art. 13; Treasury Dec. 2547, Oct. 26, 1917.

The fundamental idea of a manufactured article is that it must be so nearly completed as to be serviceable for the purpose for which it was designed.

There is no difference in kind between customs duties and excise duties such as would, even a priori, require any different rule of interpretation to be applied in respect of the meaning of "parts" of shells.

Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule, 7 Wall. 433, 445, 19 L. ed. 95, 99; Nicol v. Ames, 173 U. S. 509, 519, 43 L. ed. 786, 793, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522; Patton v. Brady, 184 U. The cases fixing the meaning of the word "part" in a composite article run back well into the era of the prevalence of the tariff-for-revenue doctrine; and in no case has it been asserted, or made a ratio decidendi, that the meaning of the word is to be determined with a view to having it fit in with any tariff-for-protection view.

See United States v. 31 Boxes, Fed. Cas. No. 16,465a.

In none of the later cases where the "part" has come up for interpretation, so far as we have been able to find, has anything but resort to the natural meaning of the word been found necessary to interpret it,—excepting only when Congress, in terms or by implication, in enacting any particular statute, divorced the word from its natural meaning. This is in accord with the settled doctrine that the natural, obvious meaning must be given to the language of a statute where there is no ambiguity in it.

Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Sulzberger, 157 U. S. 1, 36, 39 L. ed. 601, 611, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508.

The lower court was wholly in error in its assumption that the meaning of the words we are considering was fixed for it exclusively in the customs tariff cases, and that that meaning must be confined to such cases.

Burdon Cent. Sugar Ref. Co. v. Payne, 167 U. S. 127, 42 L. ed. 105, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 754; Allen v. Smith, 173 U. S. 389, 43 L. ed. 741, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 446; Tide Water Oil Co. v. United States, 171 U. S. 210, 43 L. ed. 139, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837; Re I. Rheinstrom & Sons Co. 207 Fed. 130; Central Trust Co. v. Lueders, 137 C. C. A. 387, 221 Fed. 838.

The essential inquiry was not what Congress intended, but what is the meaning of the words it used to express that intent; and that meaning, when ascertained, not only determines the meaning of the statute, but the congressional intent in enacting it.

United States v. Goldenberg, 168 U. S. 95, 102, 42 L. ed. 394, 398, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 3; Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Sulzberger, 157 U. S. 1, 37, 39 L. ed. 601, 611, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; Dewey v. United States, 178 U. S. 510, 521, 44 L. ed. 1170, 1174, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 981.

A tax is never imposed on a citizen when the question of his liability is at all doubtful.

Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Sulzberger, 157 U. S. 1, 36, 39 L. ed. 601, 611, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; 36 Cyc. 1114; Rice v. United States, 4 C. C. A. 104, 10 U. S. App. 670, 53 Fed. 912; Spreckles Sugar Ref. Co. v. McClain, 192 U. S. 397, 416, 48 L. ed. 496, 503, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; Benziger v. United States, 192 U. S. 38, 55, 48 L. ed. 331, 338, 24 Sup. Ct. Assistant Attorney General Frierson argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent.

This writ is directed to the judgment of the circuit court of appeals, affirming a judgment of the district court for Lederer, to whom we shall refer as the collector, [508] in an action by petitioner to recover from him the sum of $74,857.07, exacted as a tax under § 301 of the Munitions Manufacturers Tax Act of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. at L. 756, 781, chap. 463, Comp. Stat. §§ 6336a, 6336¼b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 312, 350), and paid by petitioner under protest.

A detail of the imposition of the tax and the protest of its payment is unnecessary to give. The other facts were stipulated, and it appears from the stipulation that during the taxable year 1916 petitioner made the steel for and did the forging on certain shell bodies under an order from the Midvale Steel Company, to enable the latter company to carry out a contract which it had with the government of France for certain explosive shells. The steel was made and the forging done by petitioner in accordance with specifications required by the French government, which specifications were attached to the order from the Midvale Steel Company to petitioner.

Inspectors employed by the French government inspected the work done by petitioner, testing the steel and examining the forgings as they passed through petitioner's hands. "Up to the time when the blooms of steel were sliced partly through into billets, the right of inspection was exercised by the French inspector in chief, only whenever he desired to exercise it." Some forgings were rejected, and those that were passed were so marked by the inspector. This was done in accordance with an understanding between petitioner and the Midvale Steel Company.

The profits upon which the tax claimed in this case was imposed were derived solely from the sale of the above-mentioned forgings.

The Munitions Tax Act provides (§ 301, 39 Stat. at L. chap. 463, p. 781, Comp. Stat. § 6336¼b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 350) "that every person manufacturing" certain articles and "shells," "or any part of any of the articles mentioned . . . shall pay for each taxable year, in addition to the income tax imposed by title I., an excise tax of twelve and one half per centum upon the entire net [509] profits actually received or accrued for said year from the sale or disposition of such articles manufactured within the United States."

The question is the simple and direct one whether a shell forging under the stipulation and evidence is "any part of a shell within the meaning of the law. The argument of petitioner, in support of a negative answer, is very diffuse, pressing considerations which we do not think are relevant.

A shell is a definite article, constituted of materials of a certain kind and quality, assembled and fitted and finished so as to be adequate for its destructive purposes. Is not every element (we use the word for want of a better) in the aggregation or composition or amalgamation (whichever it is) of a shell, a part of it? If not, what is it? And what is the test to distinguish a part from not a part? We use the negative as an antithetic word does not occur to us to express that something necessary to constitute a thing is not a part of it. Petitioner surmounts the difficulty by contending that the law, by its words "any part" of any of the "shells," implies a substantially finished part, as related to the whole structure and to the purpose it is intended to subserve. "Otherwise," counsel say, "the word [part] loses all precision, and becomes equivalent to the words 'ingredient' or 'material composing or making up.'" And to sustain this view they take us to the dictionaries and to an enumeration of the processes to which the material must be subjected to make a forging, and those afterwards to prepare it for a shell. In this enumeration letters of the alphabet are used of which "A, B, C, and H represent stages of development of the material prior to delivery" to the Midvale Company, and "D, E, F, G, H, I, and K represent stages of development by Midvale after delivery to it." It is quite obvious, of course, as counsel declare, that the forgings were "not shells; since a shell is a composite structure of several parts." But [510] counsel go farther and say that the forgings were "not parts of shells, in any practical and legal sense, because their development was so far short—80 per cent—of the point where they could be related to or combined with any other component of the shell structure, that they could not satisfy any fair meaning of the shell body unit as entering into the composite shell as a whole." We give counsel's words because we fear that by paraphrasing them we might not correctly represent their meaning and contention.

We reject the contention. Congress did not intend to subject its legislation to such artificialities and make it depend upon distinctions so refined as to make a part of a shell not the taxable "part" of the law. Besides, petitioner understates its work. It did not deliver raw material to the Midvale Company. Certain processes had been performed on the material, giving it a shape adapted to its destination. It was made cylindrical, hollow, with one end closed. It was rough, it is true, but an advance upon the raw material.

The progressive processes need not be enumerated. The lower courts have enumerated them, and the court of appeals, describing them, said that the "steps," "six in all," were progressive advances toward the chemical constituents, the shape and dimensions required by and essential to, the manufacturer of shells in compliance with the contract. And the court distinguished the effect of the steps. With the fourth, it was said, the inspection by the French government began; the fifth took the fluid metal [the result of the second step] from the possibility of use for general commercial purposes, and by a forging process restricted the steel to the field of use for shells. By the sixth step this forging "was drawn to a length, and to an inside and outside diameter which enabled the Midvale Company to carry forward its twenty-nine progressive steps, which the six" of [511] petitioner "were required to complete the manufactured shell of the contract."

"Manifestly," as counsel for the collector says, "the shell body was not completely manufactured by either of the companies which were engaged in its production," but "by the two acting together." And each, therefore, is liable for the profit it made, and judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Van Devanter dissent.

FORGED STEEL WHEEL COMPANY, Petitioner,
v.
C. G. LEWELLYN, Collector of Internal Revenue.

Internal revenue — munitions tax — who is manufacturer.

1. The net profits received by a corporation from the manufacture and sale of certain steel forgings to be used by the vendee to fulfil the latter's contract to supply a foreign government with high explosive shells are taxable under the Munition Manufacturer's Tax Act of September 8, 1916, imposing a tax on any person manufacturing shells or any part of them.

Appeal — review — question not raised below — reversal without remanding for new trial.

2. The action of a Federal circuit court of appeals in simply reversing the judgment of a district court against a collector of internal revenue for the recovery back of certain taxes paid under protest without remanding the case for a new trial is not open to attack in the Federal Supreme Court where there was no objection made to that action and no request for a remand of the case,—especially where there was nothing to retry, the case involving only propositions of law.

Assistant Attorney General Frierson argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

Action brought by petitioner against Lewellyn, collector of internal revenue in the district court for the western district of Pennsylvania, to recover the sum of $246,920.18, exacted from petitioner as a tax under the Munitions Tax Act, and paid under protest. Interest was also prayed from November 27, 1917.

The tax was exacted upon the ground (and it was so alleged) that that sum was the tax on the amount of the net profits received by petitioner from the manufacture and sale of certain steel forgings used in the manufacture of shells.

The circumstances said to show the tax to have been illegally exacted were detailed, of which there was denial by the collector, and, upon issues thus formed, the case was tried to a jury, which, in submission to the instructions of the court, returned a verdict for petitioner for the amount prayed. Judgment upon the verdict for the sum of $263,258.06 was reversed by the circuit court of appeals.

The court of appeals considered in one opinion this case and Carbon Steel Co. v. Lewellyn, 251 U. S. 501, ante, 375, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283, and Worth Bros. Co. v. Lederer, 251 U. S. 507, ante, 377, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282. The last two cases we have just decided, and we can immediately say, that if this case does not differ from them in its facts, it does not in principle. It will turn, as they did, upon the construction of § 301 of the Munitions Tax Act (Sept. 8, 1916, 39 Stat. at L. 756, 781, chap. 463, Comp. Stat. §§ 6336a, 6336½b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 312, 350), which imposes upon "every person manufacturing . . . shells . . . , [513] or any part" [italics ours] of them, a tax of 12½ per cent for each taxable year upon the entire net profits received or accrued" for such years from the sale or disposition of the shells manufactured in the United States. The contention in the Worth Case was explicitly as it is in this case, that the words "any part," as used in the act, "means a substantially finished part;" a part, as there said, which has relation "to the whole structure and to the purpose it is intended to subserve." Here it is said, "The fundamental idea of a manufactured article is that it must be so nearly completed as to be serviceable for the purpose for which it was designed."

The reasoning of the Worth Case covers, therefore, the contention here, and rejects it, if, as we have said, the facts be the same, and we think they are. There are some circumstances of complexity, but they are easily resolved, and do not disturb the principle of decision. Of the facts, the court of appeals said:

"From the proofs it appears the British government made contracts with certain persons whereby the latter agreed to supply it with high explosive shells in compliance with the specifications, requirement, and inspection of the said government. To fulfil such shell contract the contractor made subcontracts with the Forged Steel Wheel Company, by which the latter agreed to manufacture and furnish to said contractor, rough steel shell forgings of the character provided in the contract as to chemical constituents, tensile strength, size, shape, etc. To fulfil its contract, the Forged Steel Wheel Company either made, had made, or bought in the market, the grade of steel required. This steel was of a common commercial type known as rounds. These rounds it nicked and broke into 18-inch lengths, which it then heated and put through two forging processes, by the first of which a hole was pierced from one end of the round to within 2 inches of the other; by the second, the round was lengthened by drawing [514] it through three successive rings of a hydraulic press. The output of the Forged Steel Wheel Company's work was a hollow steel body or shell form, of a suitable composition, shape, and length from which to make, to the British government standards, the high explosive projectiles contracted for. The weight of such shell forms was about 170 pounds. To make this shell form suitable for use as a shell, the contractor, to whom the Forged Steel Wheel Company then delivered it, was required to dress, bore, and machine it down to 77 pounds; this required some 27 distinct and separate processes."

The court, after further comment on the facts, and consideration of the opinion of the district court and its reasoning, and distinguishing the cases that influenced the district court, said: "But in the excise law in question, Congress is dealing with the imposing of taxes as the main object, and with the work done as a mere incident to aid in determining the tax. In that aspect the quantum of the work done is immaterial." And again, "The crucial question is not the quantum of the manufacture, measured by steps, but the fact of manufacture, resulting in profits."

Replying to the contention that the purpose of Congress was not to tax anyone but the manufacturer of a completed shell or the maker of a completed part of a shell, and that the forging of the Wheel Company was not a completed part of a shell, the court of appeals said: "It is manifest that, standing alone, the statute neither expresses nor implies any warrant or implication for limiting the broad, inclusive, generic words 'any part' to the restricted, specific, qualified term, 'any completed part.'"

The court of appeals also considered the rule of construction that statutes levying taxes should not be extended by implication beyond the clear import of their language and the cases from which the rule was deduced. The rule was conceded; its application to the present controversy was denied.

[515] For the sake of brevity we consider only the cited decisions of this court. They are Tide Water Oil Co. v. United States, 171 U. S. 210, 218, 43 L. ed. 139, 141, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837; Worthington v. Robbins, 139 U. S. 337, 35 L. ed. 181, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581; Anheuser-Busch Brewing Asso. v. United States, 207 U. S. 556, 52 L. ed. 336, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 204. These were customs cases and the statutes were given an interpretation on account of their purpose. They are, besides, not in point. In the first one the statute had the words "wholly manufactured," and, giving effect to them, it was decided that boxes made from shooks imported from Canada, though nailed together, and the sides of the boxes thus formed trimmed in the United States, were not boxes "wholly manufactured" in the United States, and entitled, upon being exported, to a drawback under a statute which allowed a drawback on articles "wholly manufactured of materials imported." The Worthington Case was cited. In that case a duty was exacted upon "white hard enamel" under a statute which imposed a duty of 25 per cent upon "watches, watch cases, watch movements, parts of watches, and watch materials." This on the contention of the government that the enamel fell under the head of "watch materials." The contention was rejected, it being conceded that the enamel was used for many other purposes than for watch faces. In the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Asso. Case a claim of drawback upon corks exported with bottled beer was rejected. The ground of the claim was that the corks were subjected to a special treatment to be fit for use, and hence it was contended that they should be regarded as "imported materials . . . used in the manufacture of articles manufactured or produced in the United States;" that is, the bottled beer. We replied: "A cork put through the claimant's process is still a cork." The cases, therefore, do not sustain the contention for which they are cited.

Objection is made to the action of the Circuit Court of Appeals in simply reversing the judgment of the District Court, and not remanding the case for a new trial. There [516] was no objection made to that action, and no request for a remand of the case; and, other cases are opposed to the contention, and that, besides, no constitutional rights can be based on the error of prior decisions.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTH COAST STEAMSHIP COMPANY, Claimant of the Steamer "South Coast," Petitioner,[1]

v.

J. C. RUDBACH.

Maritime liens — supplies — chartered vessel — authority of master.

A person furnishing supplies on the master's order to a chartered vessel in a domestic port on the credit of the vessel, although notified by the owner not to do so, is entitled to a lien therefor where the charter party recognizes that liens may be imposed by the charterers and allowed to stand for less than one month, in view of the Act of June 23, 1910, which in § 1 gives a maritime lien for such supplies, and in § 3 declares the presumption that a master appointed by a charterer has authority to procure them, although the statute further provides that nothing in it shall be considered to give a lien where the furnisher knew, or, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have ascertained, that, because of the terms of the charter party, or for any other reason, the person ordering necessaries was without authority to bind the vessel, since if the assumption expressed in the words of the charter party, that the charterers had power to authorize the master to impose the lien, was not equivalent to a grant of power, it at least cannot be taken to have excluded it, and there was nothing from which the furnisher could have ascertained that the master did not have power to bind the ship.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the Northern District of California, enforcing a maritime lien for supplies furnished to a vessel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Oliver Dibble submitted the cause for petitioner. Messrs. Marcel E. Cerf and C. H. Sooy were on the brief:

A charter party which requires the charter to furnish supplies to the ship withdraws from the master the power to order supplies for which the materialman, with knowledge of the terms of the charter party, may assert a lien.

Supplies furnished a chartered vessel when she is not in distress or in such a position that the supplies availed the owner as well as the charterer cannot constitute the basis of a lien, if the vessel were held under a charter party which required the charterer to furnish the supplies, and the furnisher knew the facts, or, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have ascertained them. And this is so even though the supplies were furnished at the instance of the master.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel against the steamer South Coast, belonging to the claimant, a California corporation, and registered in San Francisco, for necessary supplies furnished in San Pedro, California. The answer denies the authority of the master to bind the steamer. The bare vessel at the time was under charter to one Levick, the contract stipulating that Levick was to pay all charges and to save the owner harmless from all liens or expenses that it might be put to in consequence of such liens. There was also a provision that the owner might retake the vessel in case of failure of Levick to discharge within thirty days any debts which were liens upon it, and another for surrender of the vessel free of all liens upon Levick's failure to make certain payments. When the supplies were ordered, representatives of the owner in San Pedro warned the libellant that the steamer was under charter, and that he must not furnish the supplies on the credit of the vessel. He replied that he would not furnish them in any other way, but the reply does not affect the case, because, by the terms of the charter, the master who ordered them, although appointed by the owner, was under the orders of Levick. It is agreed by both courts below that if the owner had power to prevent the attaching of a lien by its warning, it had done so. Both courts, however, held that the charter gave the master power to create the lien. 233 Fed. 327; 159 C. C. A. 302, 247 Fed. 84.

[523] By the Act of June 23, 1910, chap. 373, § 1, 36 Stat. at L. 604, Comp. Stat. § 7783, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 346, a maritime lien is given for such supplies, and by § 3 a presumption is declared that a master appointed by a charterer has authority from the owner to procure them. It is true that the act goes on that nothing in it shall be considered to give a lien where the furnisher knew, or, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have ascertained, that, because of the terms of a charter party, or for any other reason, the person ordering the necessaries was without authority to bind the vessel. But the authority of the owner to prohibit or to speak was displaced, so far as the charter went, by that conferred upon the charterers, who became owners pro hac vice, and therefore, unless the charter excluded the master's power, the owner could not forbid its use. The charter party recognizes that liens may be imposed by the charterers and allowed to stand for less than a month, and there seems to be no sufficient reason for supposing the words not to refer to all the ordinary maritime liens recognized by the law. The statute had given a lien for supplies in a domestic port, and therefore had made that one of these ordinary liens. Therefore the charterer was assumed to have power to authorize the master to impose a lien in a domestic port, and if the assumption expressed in words was not equivalent to a grant of power, at least it cannot be taken to have excluded it. There was nothing from which the furnisher could have ascertained that the master did not have power to bind the ship.

Decree affirmed.

CLARENCE ALFRED BUNKER and John D. Hardy, Administrators, etc., of George E. Richardson, Deceased. (No. 158.)

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 524-532.)

National banks — liability of directors — negligence — defalcation by employee.

1. The directors of a national bank

Note.—Generally, as to liability of directors for defalcations by executive did not necessarily so neglect their duty as to be answerable for thefts by a teller and bookkeeper, concealed by overcharging a depositor, or by a false addition in the column of drafts or deposits in the depositors' ledger, merely because they accepted the cashier's statement of liabilities and did not inspect the depositors' ledger, even after an apparent shrinkage in deposits, where the cashier's statements of assets always were correct, the semiannual examination by the government examiners had disclosed nothing pointing to malfeasance, and they were encouraged in their belief that all was well by the president, whose responsibility as executive officer, interest as large stockholder and depositor, and knowledge from long daily presence in the bank were greater than theirs.

National banks — liability of president — negligence — defalcation by employee.

2. The failure of the president and executive officer of a national bank to heed hints and warnings, including an apparent shrinkage in deposits, which, however little they may have pointed to the specific facts of theft by a teller and bookkeeper, would, if accepted, have led to an examination of the depositors' ledger, thereby disclosing past and preventing future thefts, may be treated by the courts as such negligence as renders him liable for thefts by such employee after he had the warnings which should have led to steps that would have made fraud impossible, even though the precise form that the fraud would take hardly could have been foreseen.

Interest — on judgment.

3. The reduced amount which a circuit court of appeals, modifying a decree of a district court, finds to be due the receiver of a national bank from its president on account of the latter's failure to guard against thefts by a teller and bookkeeper should bear interest from the date of the decree of the district court until the receiver interposed a delay by appealing to the Supreme Court from the decree of the circuit court of appeals.

[For other cases, see Interest, II. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued January 19 and 20, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

FOUR APPEALS from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit to review a decree which reversed in part a decree of the District Court for the District of Massachusetts in favor of the receiver of a national bank in a suit to charge its former president and directors with a loss of assets through the theft of an employee. Modified by allowing interest upon the sum found to be due, and, as so modified, affirmed.

See same case below, 162 C. C. A. 541, 250 Fed. 525.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank N. Nay argued the cause, and, with Mr. William A. Kneeland, filed a brief for John L. Bates:

As a matter of law, the directors of a bank may be liable for their negligence in handling the affairs of the bank, even when no dishonesty is to be imputed to them.

Of course, technically, the directors of a national bank are not trustees, since they have no title to the assets of the bank; but the tendency of modern decisions has been to hold that they act in a fiduciary capacity. In the absence of an express vote or well-established usage, the president of a national bank has no greater powers or responsibilities than the other directors, except as he is the presiding officer at meetings of the board and of the stockholders, and is charged by statute with certain specific duties which are of no consequence in this case. With relation to the other directors, the president is simply primus inter pares.

On the other hand, the cashier of a bank is ordinarily its chief executive, and all matters connected with the details of its business, including the supervision of the employees and of the books, are properly intrusted to him.

It is, of course, possible for the president of a bank to be made by the directors its executive head, and this is often the case with large banks in which the president devotes his whole time to the affairs of the bank, and receives a salary proportionate to the responsibilities thus assumed. But such a situation is to be sharply distinguished from the ordinary case of a small bank, whose president receives only a nominal compensation, if any, and is engaged primarily in other business.

A liability of this kind should not be lightly imposed in the absence of any element of positive misfeasance.

In the absence of an express vote or well-established usage, the president of a national bank has no greater powers or responsibilities than the other directors, except as he is the presiding officer at meetings of the board and of the stockholders, and is charged by statute with certain specific duties which are of no consequence in this case. With relation to the other directors, the president is simply primus inter pares.

On the other hand, the cashier of a bank is ordinarily its chief executive, and all matters connected with the details of its business, including the supervision of the employees and of the books, are properly intrusted to him.

It is, of course, possible for the president of a bank to be made by the directors its executive head, and this is often the case with large banks in which the president devotes his whole time to the affairs of the bank, and receives a salary proportionate to the responsibilities thus assumed. But such a situation is to be sharply distinguished from the ordinary case of a small bank, whose president receives only a nominal compensation, if any, and is engaged primarily in other business.

checks for the amount he wanted, exchange checks with a Boston broker, get cash for the broker's check, and, when his own check came to the bank through the clearing house, would abstract it from the envelop, enter the others on his book, and conceal the difference by a charge to some other account or a false addition in the column of drafts or deposits in the depositors' ledger. He handed to the cashier only the slip from the clearing house that showed the totals. The cashier paid whatever appeared to be due and thus Coleman's checks were honored. So far as Coleman thought it necessary, in view of the absolute trust in him on the part of all concerned, he took care that his balances should agree with those in the cashier's book.

[528] By May 1, 1907, Coleman had abstracted $17,000, concealing the fact by false additions in the column of total checks, and false balances in the deposit ledger. Then for the moment a safer concealment was effected by charging the whole to Dresser's account. Coleman adopted this method when a bank examiner was expected. Of course when the fraud was disguised by overcharging a depositor it could not be discovered except by calling in the pass books, or taking all the deposit slips and comparing them with the depositors' ledger in detail. By November, 1907, the amount taken by Coleman was $30,100, and the charge on Dresser's account was $20,000. In 1908 the sum was raised from $33,000 to $49,671. In 1909 Coleman's activity began to increase. In January he took $6,829.26; in March, $10,833.73; in June, his previous stealings amounting to $83,390.94, he took $5,152.06; in July, $18,050; in August, $6,250; in September, $17,350; in October, $47,277.08; in November, $51,847; in December, $46,956.44; in January, 1910, $27,395.53; in February, $6,473.97; making a total of $310,143.02, when the bank closed on February 21, 1910. As a result of this the amount of the monthly deposits seemed to decline noticeably and the directors considered the matter in September, but concluded that the falling off was due in part to the springing up of rivals, whose deposits were increasing, but was parallel to a similar decrease in New York. An examination by a bank examiner in December, 1909, disclosed nothing wrong to him.

In this connection it should be mentioned that in the previous semiannual examinations by national bank examiners nothing was discovered pointing to malfeasance. The cashier was honest and everybody believed that they could rely upon him, although in fact he relied too much upon Coleman, who also was unsuspected by all. If Earl had opened the envelops from the clearing house, and had seen the checks, or had examined the deposit [529] ledger with any care, he would have found out what was going on. The scrutiny of anyone accustomed to such details would have discovered the false additions and other indicia of fraud that were on the face of the book. But it may be doubted whether anything less than a continuous pursuit of the figures through pages would have done so except by a lucky chance.

The question of the liability of the directors in this case is the question whether they neglected their duty by accepting the cashier's statement of liabilities and failing to inspect the depositors' ledger. The statements of assets always were correct. A by-law that had been allowed to become obsolete or nearly so is invoked as establishing their own standard of conduct. By that a committee was to be appointed every six months "to examine into the affairs of the bank, to count its cash, and compare its assets and liabilities with the balances on the general ledger, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the books are correctly kept, and the condition of the bank in a sound and solvent condition." Of course, liabilities as well as assets must be known to know the condition, and, as this case shows, peculations may be concealed as well by a false understatement of liabilities as by a false show of assets. But the former is not the direction in which fraud would have been looked for, especially on the part of one who, at the time of his principal abstractions, was not in contact with the funds. A debtor hardly expects to have his liability understated. Some animals must have given at least one exhibition of dangerous propensities before the owner can be held. This fraud was a novelty in the way of swindling a bank, so far as the knowledge of any experience had reached Cambridge before 1910. We are not prepared to reverse the finding of the master and the circuit court of appeals that the directors should not be held answerable for taking the cashier's statement of liabilities to be as correct as the [530] statement of assets always was. If he had not been negligent without their knowledge it would have been. Their confidence seemed warranted by the semiannual examinations by the government examiner, and they were encouraged in their belief that all was well by the president, whose responsibility as executive officer, interest as large stockholder and depositor, and knowledge, from long daily presence in the bank, were greater than theirs. They were not bound by virtue of the office gratuitously assumed by them to call in the pass books and compare them with the ledger, and, until the event showed the possibility, they hardly could have seen that their failure to look at the ledger opened a way to fraud. See Briggs v. Spaulding, 141 U. S. 132, 35 L. ed. 662, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924; Warner v. Penoyer, 44 L.R.A. 761, 33 C. C. A. 222, 61 U. S. App. 372, 91 Fed. 587. We are not laying down general principles, however, but confine our decision to the circumstances of the particular case.

The position of the president is different. Practically he was the master of the situation. He was daily at the bank for hours, he had the deposit ledger in his hands at times, and might have had it at any time. He had had hints and warnings in addition to those that we have mentioned,—warnings that should not be magnified unduly, but still that, taken with the auditor's report of 1903, the unexplained shortages, the suggestion of the teller, Cutting, in 1905, and the final seeming rapid decline in deposits, would have induced scrutiny but for an invincible repose upon the status quo. In 1908 one Fillmore learned that a package containing $150 left with the bank for safekeeping was not to be found, told Dresser of the loss, wrote to him that he could but conclude that the package had been destroyed or removed by someone connected with the bank, and in later conversation said that it was evident that there was a thief in the bank. He added that he would advise the president to look after Coleman, that he believed he was living at a pretty fast pace, and that he [531] had pretty good authority for thinking that he was supporting a woman. In the same year, or the year before, Coleman, whose pay was never more than $12 a week, set up an automobile, as was known to Dresser and commented on unfavorably to him. There was also some evidence of notice to Dresser that Coleman was dealing in copper stocks. In 1909 came the great and inadequately explained seeming shrinkage in the deposits. No doubt plausible explanations of his conduct came from Coleman and the notice as to speculations may have been slight, but, taking the whole story of the relations of the parties, we are not ready to say that the two courts below erred in finding that Dresser had been put upon his guard. However little the warnings may have pointed to the specific facts, had they been accepted, they would have led to an examination of the depositors' ledger, a discovery of past and a prevention of future thefts.

We do not perceive any ground for applying to this case the limitations of liability ex contractu adverted to in Globe Ref. Co. v. London Cotton Oil Co. 190 U. S. 540, 47 L. ed. 1171, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 754. In accepting the presidency Dresser must be taken to have contemplated responsibility for losses to the bank, whatever they were, if chargeable to his fault. Those that happened were chargeable to his fault, after he had warnings that should have led to steps that would have made fraud impossible, even though the precise form that the fraud would take hardly could have been foreseen. We accept with hesitation the date of December 1, 1908, as the beginning of Dresser's liability, but think it reasonable that interest should be charged against his estate upon the sum found by the circuit court of appeals to be due. It is a question of discretion, not of right (Lincoln v. Claflin, 7 Wall. 132, 19 L. ed. 106; Drumm-Flato Commission Co. v. Edmisson, 208 U. S. 534, 539, 52 L. ed. 606, 609, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367); but to the extent that the decree of the district court was affirmed (Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co. 138 U. S. 509, 34 L. ed. 1052, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426; De la Rama v. [532] De la Rama, 241 U. S. 154, 159, 60 L. ed. 932, 934, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 411), it seems to us just, upon all the circumstances, that it should run until the receiver interposed a delay by his appeal to this court (The Scotland, 118 U. S. 507, 520, 30 L. ed. 153, 156, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1174). Upon this, as upon the other points, our decision is confined to the specific facts.

Decree modified by charging the estate of Dresser with interest from February 1, 1916, to June 1, 1918, upon the sum found to be due, and affirmed.

Mr. Justice McKenna and Mr. Justice Pitney dissent, upon the ground that not only the administrator of the president of the bank, but the other directors, ought to be held liable to the extent to which they were held by the district court (229 Fed. 772).

Mr. Justice Van Devanter and Mr. Justice Brandeis took no part in the decision.

v.
STATE OF ARKANSAS EX REL. JOHN D. ARBUCKLE, Attorney General.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 532–534.)

Constitutional law — due process of law — equal protection of the laws — double taxation.

1. The 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution no more forbids double taxation than it does doubling the amount of the tax, short of confiscation or proceedings unconstitutional on other grounds.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, 292–336, 523–553, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — equal protection of the laws — taxes — discrimination against corporation.

2. A state may, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, tax its own corporations in respect of the stock held by them in other domestic corporations, although unincorporated stockholders are exempt.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, 292–336, 523–553, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — equal protection of the laws — taxes — discrimination against corporation.

3. Confining the recovery of back taxes to those due from corporations does not offend against the Federal Constitution.

Submitted under the 20th Rule, January 5, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Chancery Court of Sebastian county, in that state, for the recovery of certain back taxes alleged to be due from a corporation. Affirmed.

See same case below, 131 Ark. 40, 198 S. W. 702.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph M. Hill and Henry L. Fitzhugh submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

A taxing act which discriminates between properties on account of ownership violates the equality and due process clauses of the 14th Amendment.

State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Bodcaw Lumber Co. 128 Ark. 522, 194 S. W. 692; Bradley v. Richmond, 227 U. S. 477, 57 L. ed. 603, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 318; Winona & St. P. Land Co. v. Minnesota, 159 U. S. 526, 40 L. ed. 247, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 83.

Taxing by a uniform rule requires uniformity not only in the rate of taxation, but also uniformity of the mode of the assessment upon the taxable valuation. Uniformity in taxing implies equality in the burden of taxation; and this equality of burden cannot exist without uniformity in the mode of the assessment, as well as in the rate of taxation.

Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. 244 U. S. 499, 61 L. ed. 1280, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88.

The mode of assessment which requires a corporation to pay taxes upon corporate shares which have in them taxable value derived from ownership in shares of another corporation, which other corporation is by law required to separately assess and pay taxes upon the value in those shares, is duplicate taxation, inimical to the equality and due process clauses of the 14th Amendment.

188 U. S. 385, 47 L. ed. 513, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 463.

To say that the two taxes levied, one on the value of the capital stock of the Fort Smith Lumber Company, including in that value the value of the stock owned by the Lumber Company in the Railway Company and the Investment Company, are valid because a taxation of different persons, the Railway Company and the Investment Company already being taxed as such, serves to emphasize a plain disregard of the Constitution, which is construed by the supreme court of Arkansas as authorizing a taxation once, and only once, against the value inhering in the capital stock of any corporation.

Bank of California v. Richardson, 248 U. S. 476, 63 L. ed. 372, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165.

Mr. John D. Arbuckle, in propria persona, Attorney General of Arkansas, and Mr. George Vaughan submitted the cause for defendant in error:

The general background, chronology of legislation, and the contemporaneous unrest of the times reflect and confirm the court's interpretation of the revenue laws of Arkansas as applicable to corporations.

Holding companies occupy a peculiar legal status, and the "law of the case," as clearly pointed out (State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Bodcaw Lumber Co. 128 Ark. 505, 194 S. W. 692; Dallas County v. Home Fire Ins. Co. 97 Ark. 254, 113 S. W. 1113; Crossett Lumber Co. v. State, — Ark. —, 214 S. Cooper, 14 How. 488, 14 L. ed. 510; Snare & T. Co. v. Friedman, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 444, note).

In such a field the 14th Amendment is not an iron rule of equality.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by the state of Arkansas against the plaintiff in error, a corporation of the state, to recover back taxes alleged to be due upon a proper valuation of its capital stock. The corporation owned stock in two other corporations of the state, each of which paid full taxes, and it contended that it was entitled to omit the value of such stock from the valuation of its own. This omission is the matter in dispute. The corporation defends on the ground that individuals are not taxed for such stock or subject to suit for back taxes, and that the taxation is double, setting up the 14th Amendment. The case was heard on demurrer to the answer and agreed facts, and the statute levying the tax was sustained by the supreme court of the state.

The objection to the taxation as double may be laid on one side. That is a matter of state law alone. The 14th Amendment no more forbids double taxation than it does doubling the amount of a tax, short of confiscation or proceedings unconstitutional on other grounds. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 106, 24 L. ed. 616, 620; Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 136, 137, 29 L. ed. 830, 832, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 367, 368, 59 L. ed. 265, 273, 274, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep.

99. We are of opinion that it also is within the power of a state, so far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, to tax its own corporations in respect of the stock held by them [534] in other domestic corporations, although unincorporated stockholders are exempt. A state may have a policy in taxation. Quong Wing v. Kirkendall, 223 U. S. 59, 63, 56 L. ed. 350, 352, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192. If the state of Arkansas wished to discourage, but not to forbid, the holding of stock in one corporation by another, and sought to attain the result by this tax, or if it simply saw fit to make corporations pay for the privilege, there would be nothing in the Constitution to hinder. A discrimination between corporations and individu- with regard to a tax like this cannot be pronounced arbitrary, although we may not know the precise ground of policy that led the state to insert the distinction in the law.

The same is true with regard to confining the recovery of back taxes to those due from corporations. It is to be presumed, until the contrary appears, that there were reasons for more strenuous efforts to collect admitted dues from corporations than in other cases, and we cannot pronounce it an unlawful policy on the part of the state. See New York v. Barker, 179 U. S. 279, 283, 45 L. ed. 190, 193, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121. We have nothing to do with the supposed limitations upon the power of the state legislature in the Constitution of the state. Those must be taken to be disposed of by the decisions of the state court. As this case properly comes here by writ of error, an application for a writ of certiorari that was presented as a precaution will be denied.

Judgment affirmed.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1919.

JETT BROTHERS DISTILLING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF CARROLLTON.

Error to state court — Federal question — validity of state statute or authority.

1. The mere objection to an exercise of authority under a state statute whose validity is not attacked cannot be made the basis of a writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court to a state court since the amendment of September 6, 1916, to the Judicial Code, § 237. There must be a substantial challenge of the validity of the statute or authority upon the claim that it is repugnant to the Federal Constitution, treaties, or laws, so as to require the state court to decide the question of validity in disposing of the contention.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, 1645–1716, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Error to state court — Federal question — raising by petition for rehearing.

2. The overruling by the highest court of a state without opinion of a petition for rehearing cannot be made the basis of a writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, 1292–1310, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued December 19, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky, to review a judgment which affirmed in part a judgment of the Circuit Court of Carroll County, in that state, in favor of a municipality in a suit to recover taxes. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

See same case below, 178 Ky. 561, 199 S. W. 37.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Helm Bruce argued the cause, and, with Mr. George B. Winslow, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The general rule in this court is that a Federal question made for the first time in a petition for a rehearing, after delivery of an opinion by the supreme court of the state, is not made in proper time, unless the state court actually de-

Note.—On the general subject of writs of error from the United States Supreme Court to state courts—see notes to Martin v. Hunter, 4 L. ed. U. S. 97; Hamlin v. Western Land Co. 37 L. ed. U. S. 267; Re Buchanan, 39 L. ed. U. S. 884; and Kipley v. Illinois, 42 L. ed. U. S. 998.

On what adjudications of state courts can be brought up for review in the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error to those courts—see note to Apex Transp. Co. v. Garbade, 62 L.R.A. 513.

On how and when questions must be raised and decided in a state court in order to make a case for a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States—see note to Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. McGrew, 63 L.R.A. 33.

cides the question, in which event this court will take jurisdiction.

Leigh v. Green, 193 U. S. 79, 48 L. ed. 623, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390; McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U. S. 458, 51 L. ed. 566, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346.

The reason for holding that a Federal question made for the first time in a petition for a rehearing is not generally sufficient is that, as a general rule, new grounds for decisions will not be allowed to be presented in a petition for a rehearing; and therefore if the state court, in overruling the petition for a rehearing, is silent on the subject of a Federal question, it will not be presumed that it passed on the Federal question.

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Southern P. Co. 137 U. S. 48, 53, 34 L. ed. 614, 616, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10.

But in Kentucky new grounds for decision are allowed to be presented by a petition for a rehearing, and if the points thereby made are well taken, the court will change its ruling.

Elsey v. People's Bank, 168 Ky. 701, 182 S. W. 873.

It has often been held that where a Federal question is distinctly made in the court of original jurisdiction, and where the court of last resort in the state must necessarily have decided the question in order to make the decision it did make, this is sufficient to give this court jurisdiction, even though the state court was silent on the subject.

Steines v. Franklin County, 14 Wall. 15, 21, 20 L. ed. 846, 848.

Mr. A. E. Stricklett argued the cause, and, with Messrs. J. L. Donaldson, J. A. Donaldson, and G. A. Donaldson, filed a brief for defendant in error:

A Federal question raised for the first time in a petition for rehearing after judgment comes too late, and will not be considered by the Federal Supreme Court on a writ of error.

Chappell v. Bradshaw, 128 U. S. 132, 32 L. ed. 369, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; Loeber v. Schroeder, 149 U. S. 574, 37 L. ed. 856, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Carrollton brought suit against Jett Brothers Distilling Company to recover balances alleged to be due as taxes upon distilled spirits belonging to the company, held in a bonded warehouse in that city. The taxes sued for were those for the years 1907 to 1916, inclusive. It appears that during those years the city assessor undertook to assess for taxation the distilled spirits in the bonded warehouse, and the city taxes were paid as thus assessed. This suit was brought to recover taxes for the above-mentioned years upon the theory that during that period the spirits should have been valued by the state board of valuation and assessment, as provided by the statutes of Kentucky. Ky. Stat. §§ 4105, 4114. It was alleged that the valuation by the city assessor was without authority of law, by mistake, and for a much less sum than that fixed for each of said years by the state board. It was also alleged that the company had notice of the valuation fixed by the state board; that the city assessor was without authority to assess spirits in bonded warehouses; that the value fixed by him was an inconsiderable sum, and much less than that fixed by the state board in accordance with the Kentucky statutes. The Distilling Company took issue upon the petition. It pleaded the original levies for the years in question, and the payment of the taxes for each and all of the said years. It pleaded that the whisky which it was sought to tax under the new levy of 1915–1916 had been removed from the bonded warehouse of the company, and was no longer its property, and that it could no longer protect itself, as it could have done had the tax been levied while the spirits were in its possession.

[4] In the nineteenth paragraph of the answer a defense was set up upon a ground of Federal right under the Constitution. It was averred that during all the years covered by the amended petition it had been the rule, custom, habit, practice, and system in the city of Carrollton to assess and cause to be assessed the real estate therein at an average of not more than 40 per cent of its fair cash value, and to assess and cause to be assessed personal property in that city at an average of not more than 30 per cent of its fair cash value; that the assessment made by the state board upon which taxes were sought to be recovered was made at 100 per cent of the fair cash value of the whisky, and that the attempt of the plaintiff to collect the same was in violation of the defendant's rights under the Constitution of the state of Kentucky and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The circuit court gave judgment in favor of the city for the amounts claimed under the new levy of 1916, giving credit for the amounts paid under the original levies for the preceding years. The company appealed to the court of appeals of Kentucky, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. 178 Ky. 561, 199 S. W. 37. There was no other reference to the Federal Constitution than that contained in the answer, so far as we have been able to discover, and the court of appeals dealt with the Federal question, deemed to be before it, as follows (178 Ky. 566, 199 S. W. 37):

"It is further asserted that the recent cases of Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. and Greene v. Louisville R. Co. decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and reported in 244 U. S. 499, 61 L. ed. 1280, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88, uproot the contention that the act is constitutional, and hold that the state board of valuation, and the city assessor and board of supervisors, acting independently of each other, and fixing different valuations [5] of the same property, work a discrimination, inimical both to the Federal and state Constitutions. In this, however, appellant is in error. It must be borne in mind that complaint is only made of the assessment. The warehouseman had his remedy, in case of an excessive or unfair valuation, by appearing before the board of valuation and assessment at the time he received notice of the valuation fixed, and there make complaint, as provided in § 4107, Kentucky Statutes. This appellant failed to do, but acquiesced in the assessment by paying taxes both to the county and state on the valuation fixed by the state board. This being true, it cannot be heard to complain now."

The case is brought here by the allowance of a writ of error. As the judgment was rendered after the Act of September 6, 1916, chap. 448, 39 Stat. at L. 726, Judicial Code, § 237, Comp. Stat. § 1214, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 411, became effective, that act must determine the right to have a review in this court.

If the case can come here by writ of error, it is because there was drawn in question the validity of a statute or authority exercised under the state on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. Before the petition for rehearing, the contentions based upon constitutional grounds, by the plaintiff in error, were those embraced in the nineteenth paragraph of the answer, to which we have referred, and such as were deemed to be before the court of appeals of Kentucky in the portion of the opinion from which we have quoted. Neither the answer nor the opinion of the court of appeals shows that any claim under the Federal Constitution was made, assailing the validity of a statute of the state, or of an authority exercised under the state, on the ground of repugnancy to the Federal Constitution. The answer, in the nineteenth paragraph, set up discrimination because of different valuations of the property of others, claimed to violate [6] rights secured by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The opinion of the court of appeals likewise discussed the discriminatory action alleged by the plaintiff in error.

Drawing in question the validity of a statute or authority as the basis of appellate review has long been a subject of regulation in statutes of the United States, as we had occasion to point out in United States ex rel. Champion Lumber Co. v. Fisher, 227 U. S. 445, 450, 451, 57 L. ed. 591, 593, 594, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 329. What is meant by the validity of a statute or authority was discussed by this court in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 130 U. S. 210, 32 L. ed. 908, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 503, in which this court, speaking by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, said: "Whenever the power to enact a statute as it is by its terms, or is made to read by construction, is fairly open to denial and denied, the validity of such statute is drawn in question, but not otherwise." And the Chief Justice added, upon the authority of Millingar v. Hartupee, 6 Wall. 258, 261, 262, 18 L. ed. 829, 830, that the word "authority" stands upon the same footing.

In order to give this court jurisdiction by writ of error under amended § 237, Judicial Code, it is the validity of the statute or authority which must be drawn in question. The mere objection to an exercise of authority under a statute whose validity is not attacked cannot be made the basis of a writ of error from this court. There must be a substantial challenge of the validity of the statute or authority, upon a claim that it is repugnant to the Federal Constitution, treaties, or laws, so as to require the state court to decide the question of validity in disposing of the contention. Champion Lumber Co. v. Fisher, supra, and cases cited.

In the present case no such claim of the invalidity of a state statute or authority was raised in a manner requiring the court below to pass upon the question in disposing of the rights asserted. As we have said, whatever the effect of a petition for rehearing, it came too late [7] to make the overruling of it, in the absence of an opinion, the basis of review by writ of error. It follows that the allowance of the writ of error in the present case did not rest upon a decision in which was drawn in question the validity of a statute of the state, or any authority exercised under it, because of repugnancy to the Federal Constitution, and the writ of error must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

Dismissed.

HENRY FARNCOMB, Emma Donahue, Henry Lorie, et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 7–12.)

Error to state court — following decision below — construction of state statute.

1. The Federal Supreme Court, when dealing with the constitutionality of state statutes challenged under U. S. Const., 14th Amend., accepts the meaning of such statutes as construed by the highest court of the state.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, 2124–2151, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — hearing on assessment for public improvement.

2. The hearing by a board of supervisors, sitting as a board of equalization, of all complaints and objections respecting assessments for public improvements, which was provided for by a city charter, satisfies the requirement of due process of law, although such board apparently is given power only to make recommendations to the board of public works for relief, where such charter provision is construed by the state courts as not taking away the legislative power and discretion of the board of supervisors and vesting it in the board of public works, but as empowering the former board to pass an assessing ordinance charging property with the cost of an improvement which, according to its judgment, would be just and equitable.

Argued January 14, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court of the City and County of Denver, in that state, dismissing a suit to enjoin the enforcement of certain assessments for public improvements. Affirmed.

See same case below, — Colo. —, 171 Pac. 66.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. J. O'Donnell argued the cause, and, with Mr. J. W. Graham, filed a brief for plaintiffs in error:

[8] Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit was brought in the district court of the city and county of Denver by the plaintiffs in error to enjoin the city from enforcing an assessment ordinance passed to raise the necessary means to pay for certain park improvements and the construction of boulevards and streets in the city of Denver.

The charter of the city of Denver was before this court in Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 373, 52 L. ed. 1103, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 708. Sections 298 and 299 of the charter provided that the board of local improvements shall prepare a statement showing the costs of improvements, interest, cost of collection, etc., and apportion the same upon each lot or tract of land to be assessed, shall cause the same to be certified by the president, and filed in the office of the clerk. The clerk shall then, by advertisement in some newspaper of general circulation, published in the city and county, notify the owners of the real estate to be assessed, and all persons interested, that said improvements have been or will be completed, and shall specify the whole cost of the improvement, and the share so apportioned to each lot, or tract of land, or person, and any complaint or objection that may be made in writing by such persons or owners to the board of supervisors, and filed with the clerk within sixty days from the first publication of such notice, shall be heard and determined by the board of supervisors at its first regular meeting after sixty days, and before the passage of any ordinance assessing the cost of the improvements.

Section 300 provides: "At the meeting specified in said notice, or any adjournment thereof, the board of supervisors, sitting as a board of equalization, shall hear and determine all such complaints and objections, and may recommend to the board of public works any modification of their apportionments; the board of public [9] works may thereupon make such modifications and changes as to them may seem equitable and just, and may confirm the first apportionment and shall notify the council of their final decision; and the council shall thereupon, by ordinance, assess the costs of said improvements against all the real estate in said district and against such persons, respectively, in the proportions above mentioned."

Section 328 of the charter provides: "When the cost of any such park site or parkway is definitely determined, the park commission shall prepare, certify and file with the clerk a statement showing the cost thereof as required in

The findings of fact made by the trial court are conclusive, and may not be aided by additional findings. If they are insufficient to support the judgment of the trial court, that judgment should be reversed.

The conclusions of law upon which the trial court based its judgment were erroneous, and are ground for the reversal of that judgment—

(1) Because the omission of the park property from the sewer district warranted a finding of fact that the members of the municipal assembly were actuated by motives which constitute legal fraud; and

(2) Because the motives of the municipal assembly were immaterial.

State v. Moore, 121 Mo. 514, 42 Am. St. Rep. 542, 26 S. W. 345, affirmed in 159 U. S. 675, 40 L. ed. 302, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 179.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit was brought in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis by the Construction Company to recover upon a special tax bill issued by the city of St. Louis for the construction of the sewer in what is known as Manchester Road Sewer District No. 111, city of St. Louis. The Construction Company recovered a judgment on the tax bills against the plaintiffs in error, who were owners of abutting property. Upon appeal to the supreme court of Missouri the judgment below was affirmed upon hearing and rehearing. 273 Mo. 184, 201 S. W. 354.

The record discloses that the sewer, for the construction of which the assessment was made, was constructed in a certain boulevard known as Kingshighway boulevard. On the east of this boulevard, and fronting on the same for a considerable distance, is a tract belonging to the city, and known as Tower Grove park; this property was not assessed for the building of the sewer. This omission is alleged to be of such an arbitrary and discriminatory character as to render the ordinance making the assessment void as a deprivation of Federal constitutional rights [15] secured to the plaintiffs in error by the due process and equal protection clauses of the 14th Amendment.

The circuit court made findings of fact in which it found that there was no evidence that the municipal assembly of the city of St. Louis, in passing the ordinances in question, was actuated by motives of fraud or oppression; that such motives, if any, must be inferred solely from the failure to incorporate parcels or tracts of land in the sewer district, the topography of which might render it necessary or expedient to then, or thereafter, drain the water or sewage therefrom into the sewer. The court recites the nature of the title of the tract known as Tower Grove park.

It appears that the park had been conveyed to the city, the grantor reserving therefrom a strip 200 feet wide, surrounding the same. The court found that the western front of the tract thus conveyed to the city included the western gate or entrance of the park and the strip of 200 feet in width, surrounding the park proper, and embraced a total frontage along Kingshighway of about 1,470 feet, and that none of the property included within Tower Grove park and the strip of 200 feet in width, reserved for residence property, was included within the taxing district for such sewer construction. The court also finds that with the exception of an area composing some 300 feet, each way, located at the southwestern corner of the park, the western part of the park for a distance of some 600 feet east of Kingshighway is of an elevation higher than Kingshighway between Arsenal street and Magnolia avenue, and the natural drainage thereof is, in the main, westwardly towards Kingshighway, and that before the building of the sewer in question surface water and hydrants drained from said part of the park through drains and gutters under said street and sidewalk to a point west of Kingshighway. That whatever drains for surface and hydrant water existed in said western and northwestern [16] portion of the park led into that section of the sewer in question, situated in Kingshighway, adjoining the park; but the court finds that it is unable to determine from the evidence as to when such connection with said sewer was accomplished, or by whom. The court also finds that at the time the work in question was performed, it was provided by the revised ordinances of the city of St. Louis that water draining from roofs of houses should not flow over sidewalks, but should be conducted through pipes to a sewer, if available, and if not, then through pipes below the sidewalk, and into the open gutter of the street. The court does not find from the evidence that it was not possible or feasible to drain the surface water falling upon or collected from that portion of Tower Grove park, and the reserved strip of 200 feet, which is higher than and inclined towards Kingshighway, from the surface of said land, in any other manner than through or by the district sewer constructed in Kingshighway, and that sewage from houses upon said reserved strip, if any there ever be, cannot be disposed of by means other than said sewer.

As conclusions of law the court finds that it was within the powers of the municipal assembly, in the passage of the ordinances establishing the sewer district wherein the work sued for was performed, to embrace and designate therein only such real estate as, in their judgment, should be benefited thereby; that the discretion vested in the municipal legislature was not subject to review by this court, unless the powers of the legislature were affirmatively shown to have been exercised fraudulently, oppressively, or arbitrarily. And the court found that the mere omission of the lands from said district which might, at one time, be reasonably included in the sewer district in question, or as to which it is reasonable to assume that the same would be more conveniently served by the sewer in question than any other, did not justify [17] the court in concluding that the municipal assembly, in omitting said lands from the sewer district in question, was actuated by motives of fraud or oppression; or that the prima facie liability of defendants, established by the certified special tax bill, is thereby rebutted and overturned.

On the facts and conclusions of law the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of Missouri.

The establishment of sewer districts was committed to local authorities by the charter of the city of St. Louis, which had the force and effect of a statute of the state. That charter provided that, within the limits of the district prescribed by ordinance recommended by the board of public improvements, the municipal assembly might establish sewer districts, and such sewers may be connected with a sewer of any class, or with a natural course of drainage. See Woerner's Revised Code of St. Louis, 1907, p. 410, § 21.

The mere fact that the court found that a part of Tower Grove park might have been drained into the sewer, it was held by the Missouri courts, under all the circumstances, did not justify judicial interference with the exercise of the discretion vested in the municipal authorities. The court commented on the fact that it was not shown that any considerable amount of surface water was conducted away from the park by this sewer. Much less do such findings afford reason for this court, in the exercise of its revisory power under the Federal Constitution, to reverse the action of the state courts, which fully considered the facts, and refused to invalidate the assessment.

As we have frequently declared, this court only interferes with such assessments on the ground of violation of constitutional rights secured by the 14th Amendment, when the action of the state authorities is found to be arbitrary, or wholly unequal in operation and effect. [18] We need but refer to some of the cases in which this principle has been declared: Embree v. Kansas City & L. B. Road Dist. 240 U. S. 242, 60 L. ed. 624, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 317; Withnell v. Ruecking Constr. Co. 249 U. S. 63, 63 L. ed. 479, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200; Hancock v. Muskogee, 250 U. S. 454, 63 L. ed. 1081, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 528; Branson v. Bush, decided December 22, 1919, 251 U. S. 182, ante, 215, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 113.

We find no merit in the contention that a Federal constitutional right was violated because of the refusal to transfer the cause from the division of the supreme court of Missouri, which heard it, to the court in banc. See Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 673, 679, 40 L. ed. 301, 303, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 179.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY and A. J. Carney, Petitioners,

v.

FRED WARD.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 18–23.)

Master and servant — assumption of risk — employers' liability.

1. Assumption of risk is a defense to which a defendant sued under the Federal Employers' Liability Act is entitled, where the injury was caused otherwise than by the violation of some statute enacted to promote the safety of employees.

[For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Master and servant — assumption of risk — extraordinary hazard — employers' liability.

2. So far as extraordinary hazards are concerned, an interstate railway employee may assume that the employer and his agents have exercised proper care with respect to his safety until notified to the contrary, unless the want of care and dangers arising from it are so obvious that an ordinarily careful person, under the circumstances, would observe and appreciate them.

[For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

On the constitutionality, application, and effect of the Federal Employers'

Master and servant — assumption of risk — employers' liability.

3. The Federal Employers' Liability Act places a coemployee's negligence, when it is the ground of the action, in the same relation as that of the employer upon the matter of the assumption of risk.

[For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Master and servant — assumption of risk — extraordinary hazard.

4. A switchman riding on a cut of freight cars which he was to check by applying a brake when these cars should be cut off from the engine does not assume the risk of sudden precipitation from the front end of a car by the abrupt checking resulting from the failure of the engine foreman to make the disconnection at the proper time.

[For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Appeal — harmless error — instructions.

5. The inaccuracy of a charge on the assumption of risk could have worked no harm to the defendant where the situation did not make the doctrine of assumed risk a defense to the action.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VIII. m, 4, a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Appeal — harmless error — instructions.

6. A charge that contributory negligence would prevent a recovery under the Federal Employers' Liability Act could not have prejudiced the defendants, being more favorable to them than they were entitled to.

[For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VIII. m, 4, a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Jury — infringement of right — nonunanimous verdict — employers' liability.

7. State courts, when enforcing rights under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, may give effect to a local practice permitting a less than unanimous verdict.

The instructions either state that contributory negligence is a bar, which shows clearly that the instructions are based upon the Constitution and statutes of Oklahoma, or omit reference to it altogether; in which case the jury would necessarily be misled by erroneous instructions.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit was brought in the superior court, Pottawatomie county, Oklahoma, against the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company and A. J. Carney to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received by Ward while he was employed as a switchman of the railway company in its yards at Shawnee. He recovered a judgment which was affirmed by the supreme court of Oklahoma (— Okla. —, 173 Pac. 212). The ground upon which recovery was sought against the railway company and Carney, who was an engine foreman, was that Ward, while engaged in his duty as a switchman, was suddenly thrown from the top of a box car upon which he was about to apply a brake. The petition alleged, and the testimony tended to show, that Ward was engaged as a switchman [20] on a cut of cars which it was the duty of the engine foreman to cut loose from the engine pushing the cars in order that Ward might gradually stop the cars by applying the brake. It appears that, at the time of the injury to Ward, the cut of cars had been pushed up an incline by the engine, over an elevation, and as the cars ran down the track the effect was to cause the slack to run out between them, permitting them to pull apart sufficiently to be uncoupled, at which time it was the duty of the engine foreman to uncouple the cars. The testimony tended to support the allegations of the petition as to the negligent manner in which this operation was performed at the time of the injury, showing the failure of the engine foreman to properly cut off the cars at the time he directed the engineer to retard the speed of the engine, thereby causing them to slow down in such manner that when the check reached the car upon which Ward was about to set the brake, he was suddenly thrown from the top of the car, with the resulting injuries for which he brought this action.

The railway company and Carney took issue upon the allegations of the petition, and set up contributory negligence and assumption of risk as defenses. The trial court left the question of negligence on the part of the company and the engine foreman to the jury, and also instructed it as to assumption of risk by an employee of the ordinary hazards of the work in which he was engaged, and further charged the jury as follows:

"You are further instructed that while a servant does not assume the extraordinary and unusual risks of the employment, yet on accepting employment he does assume all the ordinary and usual risks and perils incident thereto, whether it be dangerous or otherwise, and also all risks which he knows or should, in the exercise of reasonable care, know to exist. He does not, however, assume such risks as are created by the master's negligence, nor such as are latent, or are only discoverable at [21] the time of the injury. The doctrine of an assumption of risk is wholly dependent upon the servant's knowledge, actual or constructive, of the dangers incident to his employment. Where he knew, or, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, should know, the risk to which he is exposed, he will, as a rule, be held to have assumed them; but where he either does not know, or, knowing, does not appreciate such risk, and his ignorance or nonappreciation is not due to negligence or want of care on his part, there is no assumption of risk on the part of the servant, preventing a recovery for injuries."

Treating the case, as the court below did, as one in which the injury occurred while the petitioners and respondent were engaged in interstate commerce, this charge as to the assumption of risk was not accurate, in stating without qualification that the servant did not assume the risk created by the master's negligence. We have had occasion to deal with the matter of assumption of risk in cases where the defense is applicable under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, being those in which the injury was caused otherwise than by the violation of some statute enacted to promote the safety of employees. As this case was not one of the latter class, assumption of risk was a defense to which the defendants below were entitled. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 58 L. ed. 1062, L.R.A.1915C, 1, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, 8 N. C. C. A. 834; Jacobs v. Southern R. Co. 241 U. S. 229, 60 L. ed. 970, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 588.

As to the nature of the risk assumed by an employee in actions brought under the Employers' Liability Act, we took occasion to say in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. De Atley, 241 U. S. 310, 315, 60 L. ed. 1016, 1020, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564: "According to our decisions, the settled rule is not that it is the duty of an employee to exercise care to discover extraordinary dangers that may arise from the negligence of the employer or of those for whose conduct the employer is responsible, but that the employee may assume that the employer or his agents have exercised proper care with respect to his safety until [22] notified to the contrary, unless the want of care and the danger arising from it are so obvious that an ordinarily careful person, under the circumstances, would observe and appreciate them." The Federal Employers' Liability Act places a coemployee's negligence, when it is the ground of the action, in the same relation as that of the employer upon the matter of assumption of risk. 241 U. S. 313. See also Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Proffitt, 241 U. S. 462, 468, 60 L. ed. 1102, 1106, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620; Erie R. Co. v. Purucker, 244 U. S. 320, 61 L. ed. 1166, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 629.

Applying the principles settled by these decisions to the facts of this case, the testimony shows that Ward had neither warning nor opportunity to judge of the danger to which he was exposed by the failure of the engine foreman to cut off the cars. In the absence of notice to the contrary, and the record shows none, Ward had the right to act upon the belief that the usual method would be followed and the cars cut off at the proper time by the engine foreman, so that he might safely proceed to perform his duty as a switchman by setting the brake to check the cars which should have been detached. For the lack of proper care on the part of the representative of the railway company while Ward was in the performance of his duty, he was suddenly precipitated from the front end of the car by the abrupt checking resulting from the failure to make the disconnection. This situation did not make the doctrine of assumed risk a defense to an action for damages because of the negligent manner of operation which resulted in Ward's injury, and the part of the charge complained of, though inaccurate, could have worked no harm to the petitioners. It was a sudden emergency, brought about by the negligent operation of that particular cut of cars, and not a condition of danger, resulting from the master's or his representatives' negligence, so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person in the situation in which Ward was placed, had opportunity to know and appreciate it, and thereby assume the risk.

[23] The trial court also charged that contributory negligence by Ward would prevent a recovery. This charge was more favorable to the petitioners than they were entitled to, as, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, contributory negligence is not a defense, and only goes in mitigation of damages. The giving of this charge could not have been prejudicial error requiring a reversal of the judgment.

Another assignment of error, dealt with by the supreme court of Oklahoma, that a jury of less than twelve returned the verdict, conforming to the state practice, does not seem to be pressed here. In any event, it is disposed of by St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Brown, 241 U. S. 223, 60 L. ed. 966, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602.

We find no error in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and the same is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA GAS COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, Second District, of the State of New York, the City of Jamestown, New York, et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 23-31.)

Commerce — what is — transportation of natural gas.

1. The direct transmission of natural gas from the source of supply outside the state to local consumers in municipalities within the state is interstate commerce.

[For other cases, see Commerce, I. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Commerce — state regulation — congressional inaction — natural gas rates.

2. Until Congress acts under its superior authority by regulating the subject-matter for itself, the exercise of authority conferred by a state upon a public service commission to regulate rates for natural gas transmitted directly from the source of supply outside the state to local consumers in municipalities within the state does not offend against the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

[For other cases, see Commerce, I. c; III. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Note.—State regulation of natural gas rates as affected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

It is settled that the transportation of gas through pipe lines from one state to another is interstate commerce. West Argued December 8 and 9, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York in and for the County of Ulster to review a judgment entered pursuant to the mandate of the Court of Appeals of that state, which affirmed a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, reversing an order of the Special Term, granting a writ of prohibition to restrain the state Public Service Commission from regulating natural gas rates. Affirmed.

See same case below in appellate division, 184 App. Div. 556, P.U.R.1919A, 372, 171 N. Y. Supp. 1028; in court of appeals, 225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John E. Mullin argued the cause, and, with Mr. Marion H. Fisher, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Natural gas is a legitimate article of commerce, and the transportation thereof by pipe line from one state for sale in another is interstate commerce.

West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 221 U. S. 229, 55 L. ed. 716, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1193, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Kansas Natural Gas Co. v. Haskell, 172 Fed. 545; Haskell v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 224 U. S. 217, 56 L. ed. 738, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 442; Haskell v. Cowham, 109 C. C. A. 235, 187 Fed. 403; Landon v. Public Utilities Commission, P.U.R.1918A, 31, 242 Fed. 682.

The facts at bar present a much stronger case for the protection of the commerce clause than those to which the protection of the "original package" doctrine is commonly given. The gas company cannot be deprived of this protection merely because its business cannot be tested by some particular phrase originally used by the court in applying the Constitution to the facts before it at a time when the natural gas business was not even dreamed of. To give to such phrases the binding force of inflexible law is to nullify the boasted flexibility of the Federal Constitution.

This principle, however, does not prevent all regulation of the rates by the state in which the gas is sold. The theory followed in PENNSYLVANIA GAS CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, that, in the absence of action by Congress, relating thereto, the states may regulate rates for natural gas transmitted from other states, had been anticipated in several decisions. Manufacturers' Light & Heat Co. v. Ott, 215 Fed. 940; State ex rel. Caster v. Flannelly, 96 Kan. 372, P.U.R.1916C, 810, 152 Pac. 22; State ex rel. Bristow v. Landon, 100 Kan. 593, 165 Pac. 1111.

Where the gas is produced in several states and commingled in pipe lines, from which it is sold, some doubt has been expressed as to its being interstate commerce.

In Manufacturers' Light & Heat Co. v. Ott, supra, corporations from West Virginia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania had united their operations in pumping gas into a common system of pipes supplying customers in the three states. The action involved the right of the West Virginia Public Service Commission to regulate the rates charged to customers in West Virginia. The court says that although the fact that this system of operation may have resulted in some gas from Ohio and Pennsylvania coming into West Virginia, it is undisputed that a much larger quantity of gas went out of West Virginia into Ohio and Pennsylvania; and further, that this interflow of gas from one state to another, according to the pressure from the main gas pipe at common reservoirs, cannot affect the power of the state of West Virginia to make reasonable regulations as to the rates for gas furnished to its own citizens. But it is further stated that it is unnecessary to decide whether Congress may not regulate charges for natural gas under such conditions, and that, Congress having taken no action, it was clearly within the power of the state legislature to provide for the protection of its own citizens against excessive charges.

In State ex rel. Caster v. Flannelly, 96 Kan. 372, P.U.R.1916C, 810, 152 Pac. 22, it is said not to be interstate commerce to sell natural gas to the

The power to regulate interstate commerce granted by the commerce clause to the Federal government is not only paramount, but exclusive of any power in the states, and the inaction of Congress is an expression of its intention that such commerce shall be free from consumers thereof in Kansas, where the gas sold was produced in Kansas and Oklahoma, and that produced in Oklahoma, after being conveyed in pipe lines to Kansas, was so commingled in the pipe lines conveying the same with the gas produced in Kansas that it was impossible to separate or distinguish the two, and, after being so commingled, it was conveyed from city to city throughout the state, and there sold to the consumers. The Kansas court seems to reach this conclusion on the "original package" theory, holding that, after the bulk of the imported gas is broken up for indiscriminate distribution to individual purchasers at retail sales, the interstate commerce is at an end. This decision, however, seems finally to be rested upon the principle that the state may regulate interstate commerce of the character of natural gas in the absence of action by Congress. It seems that at least the same companies were involved in the foregoing Kansas cases as were involved in the United States Supreme Court case of Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, where the court emphasizes the sale by the transporting company to the local company as taking it out of the domain of interstate commerce. The United States Supreme Court holds that the sale and delivery of gas to customers at burner tips by local distributing companies operating under special franchises, and the payment of two thirds of their receipts to the natural gas company furnishing the gas through interstate pipe lines, do not constitute any part of interstate commerce so as to exclude state regulation of local rates as confiscatory and as unduly burdening such commerce.

The "original package" doctrine was invoked by the Maryland court of appeals in West Virginia & M. Gas Co. v. Fowers, — Md. —, P.U.R.1919D, 332, 106 Atl. 265, although the company which actually sold the gas to consumers received it at a point in West Virginia and transported it across the state line into Maryland. It appeared in this case that the gas was transported from the wells in gathering lines to compresser stations, where it was compressed and taken into other pipe lines to the main compresser station, where it was again compressed. After leaving this station and passing through other pipes it ultimately entered the main pipe line of the corporation which transferred it into Maryland. The gas could not be served to the consumer at the high pressure necessary for its transmission through the main line, and its pressure was reduced through what was known as a regulator, and the gas then carried to the community in low pressure mains with which the various service lines were connected. The separation of the gas from the general bulk of gas, and confining it in the intermediate pipe lines, whence it could not return to the main pipe line, where it must remain until consumed, was held to be a breaking up of the original package, and a mingling of the gas with the common mass of property in the state; hence, its

The exclusive nature of the Federal power has not only been asserted in cases where the state has attempted to fix interstate rates, but also to prevent interference by the state with the sale of commodities moving in interstate commerce. Attempts by the states to regulate or restrict the freedom of importation, delivery, and sale of interstate commodities have repeatedly been declared repugnant to the Constitution.

sale subject to regulation by the state commission. It is doubtful whether the view of the Maryland court of appeals is correct in view of the decision in the reported case (PENNSYLVANIA GAS CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ante, 434), which affirmed a decision of the court of appeals of New York (225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260). In the discussion of the question whether the transportation of natural gas through pipe lines from one state into another, where it is sold to consumers by the corporation making the transportation, amounts to interstate commerce, the state court says that "there is no break in the continuity of the transmission from pumping station in Pennsylvania to home and office and factory in Jamestown. A different question would arise if gas transmitted from Pennsylvania should be stored in reservoirs in New York, and then distributed to consumers as their needs might afterward develop. The quantity stored or the period of storage might require us to hold that interstate commerce was at an end when the place of storage had been reached. Kehrer v. Stewart, 197 U. S. 65, 49 L. ed. 666, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091 (the transactions would then be similar to those common in the oil business). We do not now determine the rule that should govern them. It is enough to hold that where there is in substance no storage, but merely transmission for immediate or practically immediate use, direct from seller to consumer, interstate commerce does not end till the gas has reached its goal. That, by the fair intendment of the petition, is the business conducted by this petitioner. It is not important that consumers do not signify in advance the precise amount that they will need. If their wants are approximately known and the gas is transmitted not to be held, but to be used, so that any storage that results is merely casual and incidental, the transaction is to be treated as single and continuous." The transportation was accordingly held to be interstate commerce.

The district court in Landon v. Public Utilities Commission, 245 Fed. 950 (reversed on other grounds in 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, the decree in which was vacated and the judgment modified on another point in 249 U. S. 590, 63 L. ed. 791, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389), holds that where any storage which exists is merely incidental to the transportation of the gas, the interstate character of the transportation is not destroyed.

The Pennsylvania Public Service Commission in Duggan v. Fayette County Gas Co. P.U.R.1918B, 165, held that a gas company operating in Pennsylvania, which obtained a part of its gas from Pennsylvania and part from a West Virginia company, the gas from the West Virginia company being delivered to it at the boundary line between the two states, could not defeat the jurisdiction of the Pennsylvania Public Service Commission to regulate the rates to consumers, on the theory that it was engaged in interstate commerce.

That the action threatened by the state in this case is a "regulation" of interstate commerce within the meaning of the commerce clause cannot be denied.

Federal functions may not be usurped under the police power, nor does the occupancy of highways by the plaintiff in error under local franchises authorize the state to regulate the price of gas moving in interstate commerce.

The case of Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, is decisive of the state's right to fix and determine the proper rate to be charged for gas sold to its inhabitants.

The court below having correctly determined that the Public Service Commission of the State of New York has jurisdiction to fix the rates for gas sold within that state, this court will not disturb that holding, even though a wrong reason was adopted for such correct result.

Taylor v. Thomas, 195 N. Y. 590, 89 N. E. 1113, affirmed in 224 U. S. 73, 56 L. ed. 673, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403; People ex rel. White v. Buffalo, 157 N. Y. 431, 52 N. E. 181; Ward v. Hasbrouck, 169 N. Y. 407, 62 N. E. 434; East Hampton v. Bowman, 136 N. Y. 521, 32 N. E. 987.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings before us for consideration the question whether the Public Service Commission of the State of New York has the power to regulate rates at which natural gas shall be furnished by the Pennsylvania Gas Company, plaintiff in error, to consumers in the city of Jamestown, in the state of New York. The court of [27] appeals of New York (225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260) held that the Commission had such authority.

The statute of the state of New York, § 65, Public Service Commissions Law, Laws 1910, chap. 480, provides: "Every gas corporation, every electrical corporation and every municipality shall furnish and provide such service, instrumentalities and facilities as shall be safe and adequate and in all respects just and reasonable. All charges made or demanded by any such gas corporation, electrical corporation or municipality for gas, electricity or any service rendered or to be rendered, shall be just and reasonable and not more than allowed by law or by order of the commission having jurisdiction. Every unjust or unreasonable charge made or demanded for gas, electricity or any such service, or in connection therewith, or in excess of that allowed by law or by the order of the commission is prohibited."

Consumers of gas furnished by the plaintiff in error in the city of Jamestown, New York, filed a complaint demanding a reduction of gas rates in that city. The Public Service Commission asserted its jurisdiction, which, as we have said, was sustained by the court of appeals of New York.

The Federal question presented for our consideration involves the correctness of the contention of the plaintiff in error that the authority undertaken to be exercised by the Commission, and sustained by the court, was an attempt, under state authority, to regulate interstate commerce, and violative of the constitutional power granted to Congress over commerce among the states. The facts are undisputed. The plaintiff in error, the Pennsylvania Gas Company, is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, and engaged in transmitting and selling natural gas in the state of New York and Pennsylvania. It transports the gas by pipe lines about 50 miles in length from the source [28] of supply in the state of Pennsylvania into the state of New York. It sells and delivers gas to consumers in the city of Jamestown, in the town of Ellicott, and in the village of Falconer, all in Chautauqua county, New York. It also sells and delivers natural gas to consumers in the cities of Warren, Corry, and Erie, in Pennsylvania.

We think that the transmission and sale of natural gas produced in one state, transported by means of pipe lines, and directly furnished to consumers in another state, is interstate commerce within the principles of the cases already determined by this court. West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 221 U. S. 229, 55 L. ed. 716, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1193, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Haskell v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 224 U. S. 217, 56 L. ed. 738, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 442; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Foster, 247 U. S. 105, 62 L. ed. 1006, 1 A.L.R. 1278, P.U.R. 1918D, 865, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 438.

This case differs from Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, wherein we dealt with the piping of natural gas from one state to another, and its sale to independent local gas companies in the receiving state, and held that the retailing of gas by the local companies to their consumers was intrastate commerce, and not a continuation of interstate commerce although the mains of the local companies receiving and distributing the gas to local consumers were connected permanently with those of the transmitting company. Under the circumstances set forth in that case we held that the interstate movement ended when the gas passed into the local mains; that the rates to be charged by the local companies had but an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, and, therefore, the matter was subject to local regulation.

In the instant case the gas is transmitted directly from the source of supply in Pennsylvania to the consumers in the cities and towns of New York and Pennsylvania, above mentioned. Its transmission is direct, and without intervention of any sort between the seller and the buyer. The transmission is continuous and single, and is, in our opinion, a transmission in interstate commerce, and therefore [29] subject to applicable constitutional limitations which govern the states in dealing with matters of the character of the one now before us.

The general principle is well established and often asserted in the decisions of this court that the state may not directly regulate or burden interstate commerce. That subject, so far as legislative regulation is concerned, has been committed by the Constitution to the control of the Federal Congress. But while admitting this general principle, it, like others of a general nature, is subject to qualifications not inconsistent with the general rule, which now are as well established as the principle itself.

In dealing with interstate commerce it is not, in some instances, regarded as an infringement upon the authority delegated to Congress, to permit the states to pass laws indirectly affecting such commerce, when needed to protect or regulate matters of local interest. Such laws are operative until Congress acts under its superior authority by regulating the subject-matter for itself. In varying forms this subject has frequently been before this court. The previous cases were fully reviewed and deductions made therefrom in the Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18. The paramount authority of Congress over the regulation of interstate commerce was again asserted in those cases. It was nevertheless recognized that there existed in the states a permissible exercise of authority, which they might use until Congress had taken possession of the field of regulation. After stating the limitations upon state authority, of this subject, we said (p. 402): "But within these limitations there necessarily remains to the states, until Congress acts, a wide range for the permissible exercise of power appropriate to their territorial jurisdiction, although interstate commerce may be affected. It extends to those matters of a local nature as to which it is impossible to derive from the constitutional grant an intention that they should go uncontrolled [30] pending Federal intervention. Thus, there are certain subjects having the most obvious and direct relation to interstate commerce, which nevertheless, with the acquiescence of Congress, have been controlled by state legislation from the foundation of the government because of the necessity that they should not remain unregulated, and that their regulation should be adapted to varying local exigencies; hence, the absence of regulation by Congress in such matters has not imported that there should be no restriction, but rather that the states should continue to supply the needed rules until Congress should decide to supersede them. . . . Our system of government is a practical adjustment by which the national authority, as conferred by the Constitution, is maintained in its full scope, without unnecessary loss of local efficiency. Where the subject is peculiarly one of local concern, and from its nature belongs to the class with which the state appropriately deals in making reasonable provision for local needs, it cannot be regarded as left to the unrestrained will of individuals because Congress has not acted, although it may have such a relation to interstate commerce as to be within the reach of the Federal power. In such case, Congress must be the judge of the necessity of Federal action. Its paramount authority always enables it to intervene at its discretion for the complete and effective government of that which has been committed to its care, and, for this purpose and to this extent, in response to a conviction of national need, to displace local laws by substituting laws of its own. The successful working of our constitutional system has thus been made possible."

The rates of gas companies transmitting gas in interstate commerce are not only not regulated by Congress, but the Interstate Commerce Act expressly withholds the subject from Federal control. June 18, 1910, chap. 309, § 7, 36 Stat. at L. 539, 544, Comp. Stat. §§ 993, 8563, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1108, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 337.

The thing which the state Commission has undertaken to regulate, while part of an interstate transmission, [31] is local in its nature, and pertains to the furnishing of natural gas to local consumers within the city of Jamestown, in the state of New York. The pipes which reach the customers served are supplied with gas directly from the main of the company which brings it into the state; nevertheless, the service rendered is essentially local, and the sale of gas is by the company to local consumers, who are reached by the use of the streets of the city in which the pipes are laid, and through which the gas is conducted to factories and residences as it is required for use. The service is similar to that of a local plant furnishing gas to consumers in a city.

This local service is not of that character which requires general and uniform regulation of rates by congressional action, and which has always been held beyond the power of the states, although Congress has not legislated upon the subject. While the manner in which the business is conducted is part of interstate commerce, its regulation in the distribution of gas to the local consumers is required in the public interest, and has not been attempted under the superior authority of Congress.

It may be conceded that the local rates may affect the interstate business of the company. But this fact does not prevent the state from making local regulations of a reasonable character. Such regulations are always subject to the exercise of authority by Congress, enabling it to exert its superior power under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

The principles announced, often reiterated in the decisions of this court, were applied in the judgment affirmed by the Court of Appeals of New York, and we agree with that court that until the subject-matter is regulated by congressional action, the exercise of authority conferred by the state upon the Public Service Commission is not violative of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Argued January 19, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPLICATION of the receiver of an insolvent corporation, appointed by a Court of Chancery of New Jersey, for a writ of mandamus, or, in the alternative, a writ of prohibition to require the assets of such corporation in the hands of a Federal receiver to be turned over to the applicant for administration by him as receiver. Rule discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Merritt Lane argued the cause, and, with Mr. Dougal Herr, filed a brief for petitioner.

Mr. Samuel Heyman argued the cause and filed a brief for respondent.

Note.—As to when mandamus is the proper remedy, generally—see notes to United States ex rel. International Contracting Co. v. Lamont, 39 L. ed. U. S. 160; M'Cluny v. Silliman, 4 L. ed. U. S. 263; Fleming v. Guthrie, 3 L.R.A. 54; Burnsville Turnp. Co. v. State, 3 L.R.A. 265; State ex rel. Charleston, C. C. & C. R. Co. v. Whitesides, 3 L.R.A. 777; and Ex parte Hurn, 13 L.R.A. 120.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application of J. Raymond Tiffany, as receiver, appointed by the court of chancery of New Jersey, of William Necker, Inc., for a writ of mandamus, or, in the alternative, a writ of prohibition, the object of which is to require the district judge and the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey to order the assets of the corporation, in the hands of a Federal receiver, to be turned over to applicant for administration by him as receiver appointed by the New Jersey court of chancery.

An order to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted was issued, a return was made by the district judge, and the matter was argued and submitted. The pertinent facts are: On September 30, 1916, creditors and shareholders of William Necker, Inc., a corporation of the state of New Jersey, filed a bill in the United States district court of New Jersey, alleging the [35] insolvency of the corporation, praying for the appointment of a receiver, and a distribution of the corporate assets among the creditors and shareholders. The bill alleged diversity of citizenship as a ground for jurisdiction. The defendant corporation appeared and answered, admitting the allegations of the bill, and joined in the prayer that its assets be sold and distributed according to law. Upon consent, the district court appointed a receiver. The estate is insolvent, and the assets in the hands of the Federal receiver are insufficient to pay creditors, and shareholders will receive nothing. On April 1, 1919, two and one-half years after the appointment of the Federal receiver, creditors of William Necker, Inc., filed a bill in the court of chancery of New Jersey, alleging the corporation's insolvency, praying that it be decreed to be insolvent, that an injunction issue restraining it from exercising its franchises, and that a receiver be appointed to dispose of the property, and distribute it among creditors and shareholders. A decree was entered in said cause, adjudging the corporation insolvent, and appointing the petitioner, J. Raymond Tiffany, receiver. Thereupon Tiffany made application to the United States district court, asking that its injunction enjoining the corporation and all of its officers, and all other persons, from interfering with the possession of the Federal receiver, be dissolved; that the Federal receivership be vacated, and that the Federal receiver turn over the assets of the company, then in his hands, less administration expenses, to the chancery receiver for final distribution,—the contention being that the appointment of the chancery receiver and the proceedings in the state court superseded the Federal proceeding, and deprived the Federal court of jurisdiction.

The Federal receiver had made various reports and conducted the business of the corporation up until the time of the application in the court of chancery of New [36] Jersey, in which the applicant was appointed receiver. It appears that the applicants in the state court also filed their verified claims with the Federal receiver, and that no creditor or shareholder made objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Federal court until the application in the state court.

The Federal district court permitted the chancery receiver to intervene, heard the parties, and delivered an opinion in which the matter was fully considered. As a result of such hearing and consideration an order was entered in which it was recited that Tiffany, the state receiver, had made an application to the Federal district court for an order directing it to turn over to the chancery receiver all of the assets of the corporation in the possession of the Federal receiver, and the district court ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said application of J. Raymond Tiffany, receiver in chancery, "be and the same hereby is denied."

By the Judicial Code, § 128 [36 Stat. at L. 1133, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1120, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 607], the circuit court of appeals is given appellate jurisdiction to review, by appeal or writ of error, final decisions in the district courts, with certain exceptions not necessary to be considered. It is clear that the order made in the district court, refusing to turn over the property to the chancery receiver, was a final decision within the meaning of the section of the Judicial Code to which we have referred, and from which the chancery receiver had the right to appeal to the circuit court of appeals. By the order the right of the state receiver to possess and administer the property of the corporation was finally denied. The words, "final decision in the district court," mean the same thing as "final judgments and decrees," as used in former acts regulating appellate jurisdiction. Loveland, Appellate Jurisdiction of Federal Courts, § 39. This conclusion is amply sustained by the decisions of this court. Savannah v. Jesup, 106 U. S. 563, 27 L. ed. 276, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 512; Gumbel v. Pitkin, 113 U. S. 545, 28 L. ed. 1128, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616; [37] Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276, 287, 28 L. ed. 145, 149, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 27. See also a well-considered case in the circuit court of appeals, ninth circuit,—Dexter Horton Nat. Bank v. Hawkins, 111 C. C. A. 514, 190 Fed. 924.

It is well settled that where a party has the right to a writ of error or appeal, resort may not be had to the extraordinary writ of mandamus or prohibition. Ex parte Harding, 219 U. S. 363, 55 L. ed. 252, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 392, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 324; Re Oklahoma, 220 U. S. 191, 55 L. ed. 431, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426. As the petitioner had the right of appeal to the circuit court of appeals, he could not resort to the writ of mandamus or prohibition. It results that an order must be made discharging the rule.

Rule discharged.

Appeal — from district court — dismissal — interlocutory decree — merger.

1. An appeal to the Federal Supreme Court, taken under the Judicial Code, § 266, from the denial by a district court of an interlocutory application for an injunction to restrain the enforcement of a state statute on constitutional grounds, must be dismissed where the decree as entered not only disposed of the application, but dismissed the action, and another appeal was later taken from the same decree under § 238, this being the proper practice, since the denial of the application was merged in the final decree.

Validity and construction of statutes taxing the income of nonresidents from trade, business, or other sources within the state.

The right of a state to levy an income tax upon income received by a nonresident from property within the state is definitely settled in the affirmative by the decisions in SHAFFER v. CARTER, and Travis v. Yale & T. Mfg. Co. post, 460.

The validity of a state tax upon the incomes of nonresidents was questioned in the Income Tax Cases, 148 Wis. 456, L.R.A.1915B, 569, 134 N. W. 673, 135 N. W. 164, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1147, but was not determined in that case, which was one to test the act as a whole, the court stating that the rejection of any or all of the provisions objected to could not reasonably be held to invalidate the whole act. A writ of error to review the decision of the Wisconsin court was dismissed by the United States Supreme Court in 231 U. S. 616, 58 L. ed. 400, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272.

But the state cannot grant to its residents an exemption which it denies to nonresidents. Travis v. Yale & T. Mfg. Co. post, 460. See that case for exemption involved.

The right of the state to levy a tax in the nature of an excise tax requiring the payment of a given per cent on the net income of corporations doing business within the state, and, in the case of foreign corporations apportioned according to a fixed rule, was sustained in Underwood Typewriter Co. v. Chamberlain, 94 Conn. 47, 108 Atl. 154, where the apportionment was made dependent in fact on the value of the corporate property situated within the state, and the amount of the tax was not excessive, regarded as a tax on property within the state, and where there was no discrimination against interstate commerce in the measurement or apportionment of the tax.

Necessarily a great many questions arise over the construction of such statutes.

The income from stocks and bonds of corporations organized under laws of the United States, and from bonds and mortgages secured upon property in the United States,—all owned by a nonresident alien,—which income is collected and remitted to her by an agent domiciled in the United States who has physical possession of such securities under a power of attorney which gives him authority to sell, assign, or transfer any of them,—and to invest and reinvest the proceeds of such sales, as he may deem best in the management of the business affairs of the principal, was income derived from property owned in the United States, within the meaning of the Federal Act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 236), section II. A, subd. 1, imposing a tax upon the entire net income from all property owned and of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing elsewhere. De Ganay v. Lederer, 250 U. S. 376, 63 L. ed. 1042, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524.

shipped out of the state, since the tax, not being upon gross receipts, but only upon the net proceeds, is plainly sustainable even if it includes net gains from interstate commerce.

[For other cases, see Commerce, III. d, 3, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Taxes — income of nonresident — gross production tax — implied repeal.

8. The Oklahoma gross production tax imposed upon those engaged in producing oil or natural gas within the state, in lieu of all taxes imposed by the state, counties, or municipalities upon the land or the leases, mining rights, and privileges, and the machinery, appliances, and equipment pertaining to such production, does not relieve a nonresident of the payment of the income tax imposed by that state upon the net income derived by nonresidents from oil operations within the state. The gross production tax was intended as a substitute for the ad valorem tax, but not for the income tax, and there is no such repugnance between it and the income tax as to produce a repeal by implication.

[For other cases, see Taxes, I. c, 6; Statutes, III. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — equal protection of the laws — double taxation.

9. Nothing in the Federal Constitution or in the 14th Amendment prevents the states from imposing double taxation or any other form of unequal taxation so long as the inequality is not based upon arbitrary distinctions.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. a, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — taxing income of nonresidents — lien.

But interest due a nonresident on bonds of a domestic corporation was held not income derived from sources within the state or within the jurisdiction of the state, within the meaning of the Wisconsin Income Tax Law, in State ex rel. Manitowoc Gas Co. v. Wisconsin Tax Commission, 161 Wis. 111, 152 N. W. 848.

A state statute levying a tax upon the income of a nonresident derived from sources within the state or within its jurisdiction does not authorize a tax upon the income of a trust estate,—the trustee and beneficiaries all being nonresidents, and the income not being derived from property located or business transacted within the state,—merely because a county court within the state was administering the trust. Bayfield County v. Pishon, 162 Wis. 466, 156 N. W. 463.

In some cases the statutes levy the tax upon business transacted within the jurisdiction. When business is transacted or done in a jurisdiction is a question that depends upon the facts of the individual case.

A Canadian company was transacting business in the United States, where it sent its agents clothed with power, even though limited, to travel about and solicit customers or purchasers for its manufactured products, and paid their expenses and hired a place of business in the United States, even though but desk room, and empowered such salesmen to make written contracts in part in the United States, subject to its approval in Canada, and, when approved, to deliver them, and did so ratify and have such contracts delivered, paid rent, storage charges, and other expenses and also for the work so done, by checks drawn on a bank in the United States, where it kept temporarily its funds received for goods delivered in the United States to purchasers, and then, to carry out and perform its written contracts so made, and which in nearly all cases were to be performed in the United States as to delivery of goods, and in part as to making payments therefor, shipped such goods, consigned to itself, into the United States at different points, where it hired and paid for storage or warehouse room, and had them delivered to itself at such rooms, where it stored them for itself in its own name and at its own risk, pending delivery to the customer, and did this for its own convenience and to insure delivery according to contract, and also shipped to the United States and stored in like manner goods to meet anticipated demands. Accordingly the Canadian company was held liable to an income tax in the United States. Laurentide Co. v. Durey, 231 Fed. 223.

The English statute of 1853, chap. 34, § 2, schedule D, imposes a tax upon every person, although nonresident of the United Kingdom, in respect of profits from any trade exercised within the United Kingdom.

The English court admits the difficulty of determining when a trade is carried on within the United Kingdom. Lord Esher, M. R., states in Werle v. Colquhoun, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 753: "I agree with the opinion expressed by the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in Sulley v. Atty. Gen. [infra] that it is probably a question of fact where the trade is carried on. That question is divisible into two,—Is there a trade carried on? If so, is it carried on in England? If it is a question of fact in each case it will be impossible to give ing land, oil and gas mining leaseholds, and other property used in the production of oil and gas, and whose entire net income in the state was derived from his oil operations, which he managed in that and other states as one business, having proceeded, with notice of a law of the state taxing incomes derived by nonresidents from business carried on within its borders, to manage the property and conduct the business out of which arose the income taxed under such law, cannot claim that the state exceeded its power or authority so as to deny due process of law by treating his property interests and his business as a single entity, and enforcing payment of the tax by the imposition of a lien, to be followed by execution or other appropriate process upon all the property employed by him within the state in the business.

an exhaustive definition of what constitutes carrying on a trade. The question in each case must be whether the facts shewn to exist in that particular case establish that a trade is carried on and that it is carried on in England . . . One way of testing whether this trade was carried on in England is that which I enunciated in Erichsen v. Last [infra]; that 'wherever profitable contracts are habitually made in England by or for foreigners, with persons in England because they are in England, to do something for or supply something to those persons, such foreigners are exercising a profitable trade in England even though everything to be done by them in order to fulfil the contracts is done abroad.' . . . I think that both the learned judges who heard that case expressed the same thing. Cotton, L. J., said: 'When a person habitually does and contracts to do a thing capable of producing profit, and for the purpose of producing profit, he carries on a trade or business;' and Jessel, M. R., said: 'There are a multitude of things which together make up the carrying on of trade, but I know no one distinguishing incident, for it is a compound fact made up of a variety of things;' and further: 'The company habitually receive money in this country from English subjects for messages sent from England to places abroad, and may transmit those messages from stations in this country to places abroad. This, I think, makes it a carrying on of trade in this country.' There is no reliance placed on the fact of there being an establishment in England, nor upon the fact of the money being received in England. If both these facts exist, they are strong circumstances to shew that a trade is carried on in England, but their absence is not conclusive against this." In the same case, Fry, L. J., states: "Now I shall not attempt anything like a definition of exercising a trade within the United Kingdom. I think it is obvious that the late Master of the Rolls was correct when he said that whatever else those words may mean, they plainly included carrying on a trade; and I also entirely agree in his observation that the question whether a trade is carried on is not a matter of law, or one in respect of which you can lay down any one distinguishing incident, but it is a compound fact, made up of a variety of things."

Lord Watson states in Grainger v. Gough [1896] A. C. 325, that the decision of the court of appeal in Werle v. Colquhoun "was based upon the express ground that the foreign wine merchant exercised his trade in England by making contracts there for the sale of his champagne through his English agent." This interpretation put upon the theory of the court in Werle v. Colquhoun seems correct. It was urged in that case, however, that the English agent had no authority to receive orders for the wine as contracts, but that all he could do was to forward them to the French merchant for acceptance. The court, however, states that the inference is irresistibly to the contrary; that the French wine merchant, by virtue of the contract made with his agent in London, undertook to select and despatch the wine to the address given him in England.

See also note to Maguire v. Trefry, post, —, on the question as to where a trade is carried on.

A foreign cable company which had the ends of two cables in England, at which places it maintained a staff of servants to manage the same, and also maintained an office in London, employing in all about forty clerks and electricians, and which transmitted messages from England to distant foreign ports, having an arrangement with the post-office by which messages received in England were transmitted to its outlying stations, the company making no profits by the transmission of messages over the land lines in England, was held to be exercising a trade in England, and therefore taxable under the Income Tax Law. Erichsen v. Last, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 414, 45 L. T. N. S. 703, 51 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 86, 30 Week. Rep. 301, 46 J. P. 357.

A French wine merchant who supplied large quantities of wine in England through agents, resident there, who canvassed for orders for the wine and transmitted those received to the merchant, who exercised his discretion as to filling them, the customer purchasing the wine as it lay in the cellar of the merchant, and paying the cost of packing and carriage from the cellar, taking all risks, and receiving an invoice direct from the French merchant, was held in Grainger v. Gough, supra, not to be exercising a trade in England within the meaning of the Income Tax Law, taxing nonresidents who exercised a trade within the United Kingdom.

But in Werle v. Colquhoun, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 753, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 323, 58 L. T. N. S. 756, 36 Week. Rep. 613, 52 J. P. 644, a French wine merchant who carried on his business under very similar conditions was held taxable with respect of profits on his English business.

In Tischler v. Apthorpe, 52 L. T. N. S. 814, 33 Week. Rep. 548, 49 J. P. 372, a French wine merchant was held subject to the tax where one of the partners of the French firm came to England every year and remained for about four months, soliciting orders for wines of the firm, and at the office of an English agent had a room devoted to his business, and occupied by a clerk who represented him, and the fact that the English agent was a del credere agent was held not to change this rule.

So, in Pommery v. Apthorpe, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 155, 56 L. T. N. S. 24, 35 Week. Rep. 307, a French wine merchant was held subject to taxes on profits derived from his English business where he established an agency in London, put his name over the office, had bankers in London and his name in the London directory, describing his business with the name of his agent added as wine merchants, and where the agent in London received as many orders as he could get, filled part of them from a stock which he kept in London for that purpose, and the remainder from the stock which the French wine merchant kept in France and transmitted to him upon orders. Payments in this case were made in various ways: in cash, in notes, and in some instances in drafts or bills. It was the duty of the agent to receive all these forms of paper, and, when so received, they were accepted by the English agent upon the authority of his principals as payment, unless they should be dishonored when they came to maturity.

Profits made by a New York firm in selling goods which it had purchased in England through a member of the firm who was resident there are not taxable in England. Sulley v. Atty. Gen. Profits derived by what was apparently an English company from sales in England on commission of produce shipped by growers in and under arrangements and contracts made in New Zealand for sale by the company were held not to be income derived from business in New Zealand within the meaning of a New Zealand Income Taxing Law, in Lovell & Christmas v. Tax Comrs. [1908] A. C. 46. The House of Lords admits the difficulty of determining what is income, but states that "in the present case their Lordships are of opinion that the business which yields the profit is the business of selling goods on commission in London. The commission is the consideration for effecting such sales. The moneys received by the appellants out of which they deduct their commission and from which, therefore, their profits come, are paid to them under the contract of sale effected in London. The earlier arrangements entered into in New Zealand appear to their Lordships to be transactions the object and effect of which is to bring goods from New Zealand within the net of the business which is to yield a profit. To make those transactions a ground for taxing in New Zealand, the profits actually realized in London, would, in their Lordships' opinion, be to extend the area of taxation further than the authorities would warrant."

A provision in a state income tax law granting the board of review power to increase the assessment of a nonresident without notice, while requiring notice to be given to a resident, does not violate § 2 of article 4 of the Federal Constitution, which provides that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Large Oil Co. v. Howard, — Okla. —, 163 Pac. 537.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two appeals, taken under circumstances that will be explained, from a single decree in a suit in equity brought by appellant to restrain the enforcement of a tax assessed against him for the year 1916 under the Income Tax Law of the state of Oklahoma, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the statute.

A previous suit, having the same object, was brought by him in the same court against the officials then in office, in which an application for an interlocutory injunction, heard before three judges, pursuant to § 266, Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1162, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1243, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 983], was denied, one judge dissenting. Shaffer v. Howard, 250 Fed. 873. An appeal was taken to this court, but, pending its determination, the terms of office of the defendants expired, and, there being no law of the [44] state authorizing a revival or continuance of the action against their successors, we reversed the decree and remanded the cause, with directions to dismiss the bill for want of proper parties. 249 U. S. 200, 63 L. ed. 559, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255.

After such dismissal the present defendant Carter, as state auditor, issued another tax warrant and delivered it to defendant Bruce, sheriff of Creek county, with instructions to levy upon and sell plaintiff's property in that county in order to collect the tax in question; and the sheriff having threatened to proceed, this suit was commenced. An application for an interlocutory injunction, heard before three judges, was denied upon the authority of the decision in 250 Fed., and of certain recent decisions of this court. The decree as entered not only disposed of the application, but dismissed the action. Plaintiff, apparently unaware of this, appealed to this court under § 266, Judicial Code, from the refusal of the temporary injunction. Shortly afterwards he took an appeal under § 238, Judicial Code, from the same decree as a final decree dismissing the action. The latter appeal is in accord with correct practice, since the denial of the interlocutory application was merged in the final decree. The first appeal (No. 531) will be dismissed.

The Constitution of Oklahoma, besides providing for the annual taxation of all property in the state upon an ad valorem basis, authorizes (art. 10, § 12) the employment of a variety of other means for raising revenue, among them income taxes.

The act in question is chap. 164 of the Laws of 1915. Its 1st section reads as follows: "Each and every person in this state shall be liable to an annual tax upon the entire net income of such person arising or accruing from all sources during the preceding calendar year, and a like tax shall be levied, assessed, collected and paid annually upon the entire net income from all property owned, and of every business, trade or profession carried on in this [45] state by persons residing elsewhere." Subsequent sections define what the term "income" shall include; prescribe how net income shall be computed; provide for certain deductions; prescribe varying rates of tax for all taxable incomes in excess of $3,000, this amount being deducted (by way of exemption) from the income of each individual, and for one living with spouse an additional $1,000, with further deductions where there are children or dependents, exemptions being the same for residents and nonresidents; require (§ 2) a return on or before March 1st from each person liable for an income tax under the provisions of the act for the preceding calendar year; provide (§ 9) that the state auditor shall revise returns and hear and determine complaints, with power to correct and adjust the assessment of income; that (§ 10) taxes shall become delinquent if not paid on or before the 1st day of July, and the state auditor shall have power to issue to any sheriff of the state a warrant commanding him to levy the amount upon the personal property of the delinquent party; and (by § 11): "If any of the taxes herein levied become delinquent, they shall become a lien on all the property, personal and real, of such delinquent person, and shall be subject to the same penalties and provisions as are all ad valorem taxes."

Plaintiff, a nonresident of Oklahoma, being a citizen of Illinois and a resident of Chicago, in that state, was at the time of the commencement of the suit and for several years theretofore (including the years 1915 and 1916) engaged in the oil business in Oklahoma, having purchased, owned, developed, and operated a number of oil and gas mining leases, and being the owner in fee of certain oil-producing land, in that state.

From properties thus owned and operated during the year 1916 he received a net income exceeding $1,500,000, and of this he made, under protest, a return which showed that, [46] at the rates fixed by the act, there was due to the state an income tax in excess of $76,000. The then state auditor overruled the protest and assessed a tax in accordance with the return; the present auditor has put it in due course of collection; and plaintiff resists its enforcement upon the ground that the act, in so far as it subjects the incomes of nonresidents to the payment of such a tax, takes their property without due process of law and denies to them the equal protection of the laws, in contravention of § 1 of the 14th Amendment; burdens interstate commerce, in contravention of the commerce clause of § 8 of art. 1 of the Constitution; and discriminates against nonresidents in favor of residents, and thus deprives plaintiff and other nonresidents of the privileges and immunities of citizens and residents of the state of Oklahoma, in violation of § 2 of art. 4. He also insists that the lien attempted to be imposed upon his property pursuant to § 11, for taxes assessed upon income not arising out of the same property, would deprive him of property without due process of law.

As ground for resorting to equity, the bill alleges that plaintiff is the owner of various oil and gas mining leases covering lands in Creek county, Oklahoma, and that the lien asserted thereon by virtue of the levy and tax warrant creates a cloud upon his title. This entitles him to bring suit in equity (Union P. R. Co. v. Cheyenne (Union P. R. Co. v. Ryan) 113 U. S. 516, 525, 28 L. ed. 1098, 1101, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 601; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. 339, 348, 35 L. ed. 1035, 1038, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 810, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250; Ogden City v. Armstrong, 168 U. S. 224, 237, 42 L. ed. 444, 451, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 98; Ohio Tax Cases, 232 U. S. 576, 587, 58 L. ed. 738, 743, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 372; Greene v. Louisville & I. R. Co. 244 U. S. 499, 506, 61 L. ed. 1280, 1285, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88), unless the contention that he has a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law be well founded.

This contention is based, first, upon the provision of § 9 of chap. 164, giving to the state auditor the same power to correct and adjust an assessment of income that is given to the county board of equalization in case of ad [47] valorem assessments, taken in connection with chap. 107 of the Laws of 1915, which provides (art. 1, subd. B, § 2, p. 147) for an appeal from that board to the district court of the county. In a recent decision (Berryhill v. Carter, — Okla. —, 185 Pac. 93), the supreme court of the state held that an aggrieved income taxpayer may have an appeal under this section, and that thus "all matters complained of may be reviewed and adjusted to the extent that justice may demand." But the case related to "correcting and adjusting an income tax return," and the decision merely established the appeal to the district court as the appropriate remedy, rather than an application to the supreme court for a writ of certiorari. It falls short of indicating—to say nothing of plainly showing—that this procedure would afford an adequate remedy to a party contending that the Income Tax Law itself was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Secondly, reference is made to § 7 of subd. B, art. 1, of chap. 107, Oklahoma Laws 1915, p. 149, wherein it is provided that where illegality of a tax is alleged to arise by reason of some action from which the laws provide no appeal, the aggrieved person, on paying the tax, may give notice to the officer collecting it stating the grounds of complaint and that suit will be brought against him; whereupon it is made the duty of such officer to hold the tax until the final determination of such suit, if brought within thirty days; and if it be determined that the tax was illegally collected, the officer is to repay the amount found to be in excess of the legal and correct amount. But this section is one of several that have particular reference to the procedure for collecting ad valorem taxes; and they are prefaced by this statement (p. 147): "Subdivision B. To the existing provisions of law relating to the ad valorem or direct system of taxation the following provisions are added:" Upon this ground, in Gypsy [48] Oil Co. v. Howard and companion suits brought by certain oil-producing companies to restrain enforcement of taxes authorized by the Gross Production Tax Law (Sess. Laws 1916, p. 102), upon the ground that they were an unlawful imposition upon Federal instrumentalities, the United States district court for the western district of Oklahoma held that the legal remedy provided in § 7 of chap. 107 applied only to ad valorem taxes, and did not constitute a bar to equitable relief against the production taxes. Defendants appealed to this court, and assigned this ruling for error.

inter alia; but they did not press the point, and the decrees were affirmed upon the merits of the Federal question. Howard v. Gipsy Oil Co. 247 U. S. 503, 62 L. ed. 1239, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426.

We deem it unnecessary to pursue further the question whether either of the statutory provisions referred to furnishes an adequate legal remedy against income taxes assessed under an unconstitutional law, since one of the grounds of complaint in the present case is that, even if the tax itself be valid, the procedure prescribed by § 11 of the Income Tax Law for enforcing such a tax by imposing a lien upon the taxpayer's entire property, as threatened to be put into effect against plaintiff's property, for taxes not assessed against the property itself, and not confined to the income that proceeded from the same property, is not "due process of law," within the requirement of the 14th Amendment. For removal of a cloud upon title caused by an invalid lien imposed for a tax valid in itself, there appears to be no legal remedy. Hence, on this ground, at least, resort was properly had to equity for relief; and since a court of equity does not "do justice by halves," and will prevent, if possible, a multiplicity of suits, the jurisdiction extends to the disposition of all questions raised by the bill. Camp v. Boyd, 229 U. S. 530, 551, 552, 57 L. ed. 1317, 1326, 1327, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 785; McGowan v. Parish, 237 U. S. 285, 296, 59 L. ed. 955, 963, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 543.

[49] This brings us to the merits.

Under the "due process of law" provision appellant makes two contentions: first, that the state is without jurisdiction to levy a tax upon the income of nonresidents; and, secondly, that the lien is invalid because imposed upon all his property, real and personal, without regard to its relation to the production of his income.

These are separate questions, and will be so treated. The tax might be valid, although the measures adopted for enforcing it were not. Governmental jurisdiction in matters of taxation, as in the exercise of the judicial function, depends upon the power to enforce the mandate of the state by action taken within its borders, either in personam or in rem, according to the circumstances of the case, as by arrest of the person, seizure of goods or lands, garnishment of credits, sequestration of rents and profits, forfeiture of franchise, or the like; and the jurisdiction to act remains even though all permissible measures be not resorted to. Michigan Trust Co. v. Ferry, 228 U. S. 346, 353, 57 L. ed. 867, 874, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550; Ex parte Indiana Transp. Co. 244 U. S. 456, 457, 61 L. ed. 1253, 1255, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 717.

It will be convenient to postpone the question of the lien until all questions as to the validity of the tax have been disposed of.

The contention that a state is without jurisdiction to impose a tax upon the income of nonresidents, while raised in the present case, was more emphasized in Travis v. Yale & T. Mfg. Co. decided this day [252 U. S. 60, post, 460, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228], involving the Income Tax Law of the state of New York. There it was contended, in substance, that while a state may tax the property of a nonresident situate within its borders, or may tax the incomes of its own citizens and residents because of the privileges they enjoy under its Constitution and laws and the protection they receive from the state, yet a nonresident, although conducting a business or carrying on an occupation there, cannot [50] be required through income taxation to contribute to the governmental expenses of the state whence his income is derived; that an income tax, as against nonresidents, is not only not a property tax, but is not an excise or privilege tax, since no privilege is granted; the right of the noncitizen to carry on his business or occupation in the taxing state being derived, it is said, from the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

This radical contention is easily answered by reference to fundamental principles. In our system of government the states have general dominion, and, saving as restricted by particular provisions of the Federal Constitution, complete dominion over all persons, property, and business transactions within their borders; they assume and perform the duty of preserving and protecting all such persons, property, and business, and, in consequence, have the power normally pertaining to governments to resort to all reasonable forms of taxation in order to defray the governmental expenses. Certainly they are not restricted to property taxation, nor to any particular form of excises. In well-ordered society, property has value chiefly for what it is capable of producing, and the activities of mankind are devoted largely to making recurrent gains from the use and development of property, from tillage, mining, manufacture, from the employment of human skill and labor, or from a combination of some of these; gains capable of being devoted to their own support, and the surplus accumulated as an increase of capital. That the state, from whose laws property and business and industry derive the protection and security without which production and gainful occupation would be impossible, is debarred from exacting a share of those gains in the form of income taxes for the support of the government, is a proposition so wholly inconsistent with fundamental principles as to be refuted by its mere statement. That it may tax the land but not the crop, the tree but not the [51] fruit, the mine or well but not the product, the business but not the profit derived from it, is wholly inadmissible.

Income taxes are a recognized method of distributing the burdens of government, favored because requiring contributions from those who realize current pecuniary benefits under the protection of the government, and because the tax may be readily proportioned to their ability to pay. Taxes of this character were imposed by several of the states at or shortly after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. New York Laws 1778, chap. 17; Report of Oliver Wolcott, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, to 4th Congress, 2d Sess. (1796), concerning direct taxes; American State Papers, 1 Finance, 423, 427, 429, 437, 439.

The rights of the several states to exercise the widest liberty with respect to the imposition of internal taxes always has been recognized in the decisions of this court. In M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579, while denying their power to impose a tax upon any of the operations of the Federal government, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, conceded (pp. 428, 429) that the states have full power to tax their own people and their own property, and also that the power is not confined to the people and property of a state, but may be exercised upon every object brought within its jurisdiction, saying: "It is obvious that it is an incident of sovereignty, and is coextensive with that to which it is an incident. All subjects over which the sovereign power of a state extends are objects of taxation," etc. In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Powers, 201 U. S. 245, 50 L. ed. 744, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459, the court, by Mr. Justice Brewer, said (pp. 292, 293): "We have had frequent occasion to consider questions of state taxation in the light of the Federal Constitution, and the scope and limits of national interference are well settled. There is no general supervision on the part of the nation over state taxation, and in respect to the latter the state has, speaking generally, the freedom of a sovereign both as to objects [52] and methods." That a state may tax callings and occupations as well as persons and property has long been recognized. "The power of taxation, however vast in its character and searching in its extent, is necessarily limited to subjects within the jurisdiction of the state. These subjects are persons, property, and business. . . . It [taxation] may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted, in professions, in commerce, in manufactures, and in transportation. Unless restrained by provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the state as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction." State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 319, 21 L. ed. 179, 186. See also Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 278, 23 L. ed. 347, 348; Armour & Co. v. Virginia, 246 U. S. 1, 6, 62 L. ed. 547, 550, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 267; American Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, 250 U. S. 459, 463, 63 L. ed. 1084, 1087, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522.

And we deem it clear, upon principle as well as authority, that just as a state may impose general income taxes upon its own citizens and residents whose persons are subject to its control, it may, as a necessary consequence, levy a duty of like character, and not more onerous in its effect, upon incomes accruing to nonresidents from their property or business within the state, or their occupations carried on therein; enforcing payment, so far as it can, by the exercise of a just control over persons and property within its borders. This is consonant with numerous decisions of this court sustaining state taxation of credits due to nonresidents (New Orleans v. Stempel, 175 U. S. 309, 320, et seq., 44 L. ed. 174, 180, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110; Bristol v. Washington County, 177 U. S. 133, 145, 44 L. ed. 701, 707, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585; Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 221 U. S. 346, 354, 55 L. ed. 762, 767, L.R.A.1915C, 903, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550), and sustaining Federal taxation of the income of an alien nonresident derived from securities held in this country (De Ganay v. Lederer, 250 U. S. 376, 63 L. ed. 1042, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524).

That a state, consistently with the Federal Constitution, may not prohibit the citizens of other states from carrying on legitimate business within its borders like its own [53] citizens, of course is granted; but it does not follow that the business of nonresidents may not be required to make a ratable contribution in taxes for the support of the government. On the contrary, the very fact that a citizen of one state has the right to hold property or carry on an occupation or business in another is a very reasonable ground for subjecting such nonresident, although not personally, yet to the extent of his property held or his occupation or business carried on therein, to a duty to pay taxes not more onerous in effect than those imposed under like circumstances upon citizens of the latter state. Sec. 2 of art. 4 of the Constitution entitles him to the privileges and immunities of a citizen, but no more; not to an entire immunity from taxation, nor to any preferential treatment as compared with resident citizens. It protects him against discriminatory taxation, but gives him no right to be favored by discrimination or exemption. See Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430, 20 L. ed. 449, 452.

Oklahoma has assumed no power to tax nonresidents with respect to income derived from property or business beyond the borders of the state. The 1st section of the act, while imposing a tax upon inhabitants with respect to their entire net income arising from all sources, confines the tax upon nonresidents to their net income from property owned and business, etc., carried on within the state. A similar distinction has been observed in our Federal income tax laws, from one of the earliest down to the present.[1] The Acts of 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 309, chap. 45) and 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 281, chap. 173, 13 Stat. at L. 417) [54] confined the tax to persons residing in the United States and citizens residing abroad. But in 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 137, 138, chap. 184, Comp. Stat. § 6292) there was inserted by amendment the following: "And a like tax shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing without the United States, not citizens thereof." Similar provisions were embodied in the Acts of 1870 and 1894; and in the Act of 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 236), after a clause imposing a tax upon the entire net income arising or accruing from all sources (with exceptions not material here) to every citizen of the United States, whether residing at home or abroad, and to every person residing in the United States, though not a citizen thereof, the following appears: "And a like tax shall be assessed, levied, collected, and paid annually upon the entire net income from all property owned and of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing elsewhere." Evidently this furnished the model for § 1 of the Oklahoma statute.

No doubt is suggested (the former requirement of apportionment having been removed by constitutional amendment) as to the power of Congress thus to impose taxes upon incomes produced within the borders of the United States or arising from sources located therein, even though the income accrues to a nonresident alien. And, so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned, the due process clause of the 14th Amendment imposes no greater restriction in this regard upon the several states than the corresponding clause of the 5th Amendment imposes upon the United States.

It is insisted, however, both by appellant in this case and by the opponents of the New York law in Travis v. Yale & T. Mfg. Co. 252 U. S. 60, post, 460, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228, that an income tax is in its nature a personal tax, or a "subjective tax imposing personal liability upon the recipient of the income;" and that as to a [55] non-resident the state has no jurisdiction to impose such a liability. This argument, upon analysis, resolves itself into a mere question of definitions, and has no legitimate bearing upon any question raised under the Federal Constitution. For, where the question is whether a state taxing law contravenes rights secured by that instrument, the decision must depend not upon any mere question of form, construction, or definition, but upon the practical operation and effect of the tax imposed. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 362, 59 L. ed. 265, 271, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, 237, 61 L. ed. 685, 696, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 260, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 642, 13 N. C. C. A. 927; Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U. S. 292, 294, 62 L. ed. 295, 297, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 126; American Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, 250 U. S. 459, 463, 63 L. ed. 1084, 1087, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522. The practical burden of a tax imposed upon the net income derived by a nonresident from a business carried on within the state certainly is no greater than that of a tax upon the conduct of the business, and this the state has the lawful power to impose, as we have seen.

The fact that it required the personal skill and management of appellant to bring his income from producing property in Oklahoma to fruition, and that his management was exerted from his place of business in another state, did not deprive Oklahoma of jurisdiction to tax the income which arose within its own borders. The personal element cannot, by any fiction, oust the jurisdiction of the state within which the income actually arises, and whose authority over it operates in rem. At most, there might be a question whether the value of the service of management rendered from without the state ought not to be allowed as an expense incurred in producing the income; but no such question is raised in the present case, hence we express no opinion upon it.

The contention that the act deprives appellant and others similarly circumstanced of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by residents and citizens of the state of Oklahoma, in violation of § 2 of art. 4 of the Constitution, [56] is based upon two grounds, which are relied upon as showing also a violation of the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment.

One of the rights intended to be secured by the former provision is that a citizen of one state may remove to and carry on business in another without being subjected in property or person to taxes more onerous than the citizens of the latter state are subjected to. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180, 19 L. ed. 357, 360; Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430, 20 L. ed. 449, 452; Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S. 525, 537, 63 L. ed. 1124, 1130, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2. The judge who dissented in Shaffer v. Howard, 250 Fed. 873, 883, concluded that the Oklahoma Income Tax Law offended in this regard, upon the ground (p. 888) that since the tax is, as to citizens of Oklahoma, a purely personal tax measured by their incomes, while, as applied to a nonresident, it is "essentially a tax upon his property and business within the state, to which the property and business of citizens and residents of the state are not subjected," there was a discrimination against the nonresident. We are unable to accept this reasoning. It errs in paying too much regard to theoretical distinctions and too little to the practical effect and operation of the respective taxes as levied; in failing to observe that in effect citizens and residents of the state are subjected at least to the same burden as nonresidents, and perhaps to a greater, since the tax imposed upon the former includes all income derived from their property and business within the state, and, in addition, any income they may derive from outside sources.

Appellant contends that there is a denial to noncitizens of the privileges and immunities to which they are entitled, and also a denial of the equal protection of the laws, in that the act permits residents to deduct from their gross income not only losses incurred within the state of Oklahoma, but also those sustained outside of that state, while nonresidents may deduct only those incurred within the [57] state. The difference, however, is only such as arises naturally from the extent of the jurisdiction of the state in the two classes of cases, and cannot be regarded as an unfriendly or unreasonable discrimination. As to residents it may, and does, exert its taxing power over their income from all sources, whether within or without the state, and it accords to them a corresponding privilege of deducting their losses, wherever these accrue. As to nonresidents, the jurisdiction extends only to their property owned within the state and their business, trade, or profession carried on therein, and the tax is only on such income as is derived from those sources.

Hence there is no obligation to accord to them a deduction by reason of losses elsewhere incurred. It may be remarked, in passing, that there is no showing that appellant has sustained such losses, and so he is not entitled to raise this question.

It is urged that, regarding the tax as imposed upon the business conducted within the state, it amounts in the case of appellant's business to a burden upon interstate commerce, because the products of his oil operations are shipped out of the state. Assuming that it fairly appears that his method of business constitutes interstate commerce, it is sufficient to say that the tax is imposed not upon the gross receipts, as in Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U. S. 292, 62 L. ed. 295, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 126, but only upon the net proceeds, and is plainly sustainable even if it includes net gains from interstate commerce. United States Glue Co. v. Oak Creek, 247 U. S. 321, 62 L. ed. 1135, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 748. Compare William E. Peck & Co. v. Lowe, 247 U. S. 165, 62 L. ed. 1049, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432.

Reference is made to the Gross Production Tax Law of 1915 (chap. 107, art. 2, subd. A, § 1; Sess. Laws 1915, p. 151), as amended by chap. 39 of Sess. Laws 1916 (p. 104), under which every person or corporation engaged in producing oil or natural gas within the state is required to pay a tax equal to 3 per centum of the gross value of such product in lieu of all taxes imposed by the state, counties, or municipalities upon the land or the leases, mining rights, [58] and privileges, and the machinery, appliances, and equipment pertaining to such production. It is contended that payment of the gross production tax relieves the producer from the payment of the income tax. This is a question of state law, upon which no controlling decision by the supreme court of the state is cited. We overrule the contention, deeming it clear, as a matter of construction, that the gross production tax was intended as a substitute for the ad valorem property tax, but not for the income tax, and that there is no such repugnance between it and the income tax as to produce a repeal by implication. Nor, even if the effect of this is akin to double taxation, can it be regarded as obnoxious to the Federal Constitution for that reason, since it is settled that nothing in that instrument or in the 14th Amendment prevents the states from imposing double taxation, or any other form of unequal taxation, so long as the inequality is not based upon arbitrary distinctions. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 367, 368, 59 L. ed. 265, 273, 274, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99.

The contention that there is a want of due process in the proceedings for enforcement of the tax, especially in the lien imposed by § 11 upon all of the delinquent's property, real and personal, reduces itself to this: that the state is without power to create a lien upon any property of a nonresident for income taxes except the very property from which the income proceeded; or, putting it in another way, that a lien for an income tax may not be imposed upon a nonresident's unproductive property, nor upon any particular productive property beyond the amount of the tax upon the income that has proceeded from it.

But the facts of the case do not raise this question. It clearly appears from the averments of the bill that the whole of plaintiff's property in the state of Oklahoma consists of oil-producing land, oil and gas mining leaseholds, and other property used in the production of oil and gas; and that, beginning at least as early as the year 1915, [59] when the act was passed, and continuing without interruption until the time of the commencement of the suit (April 16, 1919), he was engaged in the business of developing and operating these properties for the production of oil; his entire business in that and other states was managed as one business; and his entire net income in the state for the year 1916 was derived from that business. Laying aside the probability that from time to time there may have been changes arising from purchases, new leases, sales, and expirations (none of which, however, is set forth in the bill), it is evident that the lien will rest upon the same property interests which were the source of the income upon which the tax was imposed. The entire jurisdiction of the state over appellant's property and business and the income that he derived from them—the only jurisdiction that it has sought to assert—is a jurisdiction in rem; and we are clear that the state acted within its lawful power in treating his property interests and business as having both unity and continuity. Its purpose to impose income taxes was declared in its own Constitution, and the precise nature of the tax and the measures to be taken for enforcing it were plainly set forth in the Act of 1915; and plaintiff having thereafter proceeded, with notice of this law, to manage the property and conduct the business out of which proceeded the income now taxed, the state did not exceed its power or authority in treating his property interests and his business as a single entity, and enforcing payment of the tax by the imposition of a lien, to be followed by execution or other appropriate process, upon all property employed in the business.

No. 531. Appeal dismissed.

No. 580. Decree affirmed.

[60] EUGENE M. TRAVIS, as Comptroller of the State of New York, Appt.,
v.
YALE & TOWNE MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Constitutional law — due process of law — taxing incomes of nonresidents.

1. No violation of due process of law results from the exercise by the state of New York of its jurisdiction to tax incomes of nonresidents arising from any business, trade, profession, or occupation carried on within its borders, and to enforce payment so far as it can by the exercise of a just control over persons and property within the state, and by a garnishment of credits (of which the withholding provision of such law is a practical equivalent).

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 6, a, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — equal protection of the laws — privileges and immunities — taxing income of nonresidents — discrimination — deductions.

2. There is no unconstitutional discrimination against citizens of other states in a state income tax law merely because it confines the deduction of expenses, losses, etc., in the case of nonresident taxpayers, to such as are connected with income arising from sources within the taxing state.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. a, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — equal protection of the laws — privileges and immunities — taxing income of nonresidents — withholding at source.

3. A state income tax law does not unconstitutionally discriminate against noncitizens merely because it confines the withholding at source to the income of nonresidents, since such provision does not in any way increase the burden of the tax upon nonresidents, but merely recognizes the fact that, as to them, the state imposes no personal liability, and hence adopts a convenient substitute for it.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. a, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — impairing contract obligations — regulating foreign corporations — withholding income tax at source.

4. A foreign corporation doing business within the state and elsewhere has no just ground of complaint against a state income tax, in the absence of any contract limiting the state's power of regulation, by reason of being required to adjust its system of accounting and paying salaries and wages to the extent required to fulfil the duty of deducting and withholding the tax from that part of the salaries and wages of its nonresident employees which was earned by them within the state, although the corporation asserts that the statute impairs the obligation of contracts between it and its employees, there being no averment, however, that any such contract, made before the passage of the statute, required the wages or salaries to be paid in the state of incorporation, where it has its principal place of business, or contained other provisions in anywise conflicting with the withholding requirement.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. h, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — privileges and immunities — taxing income of nonresidents — exemptions.

5. Privileges and immunities of citizens of New York are unconstitutionally denied to citizens of Connecticut and New Jersey by the provision of the New York Income Tax Law which denies to all nonresidents, without special reference to citizenship, the exemptions accorded to residents, viz., $1,000 of the income of a single person, $2,000 in the case of a married person, and $200 additional for each dependent, although the nonresident, if liable to an income tax in his own state, including income derived from sources within New York, and subject to taxation under the New York act, is allowed a credit upon the income tax otherwise payable to New York by the same proportion of the tax payable to the state of his residence as his income subject to taxation by the New York act bears to his entire income taxed in his own state, provided that such credit shall be given only if the laws of said state grant a substantially similar credit to residents of New York subject to income tax under such laws, and although the

New York act also excludes from the income of nonresident taxpayers annuities, interest on bank deposits, interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations, or dividends from corporations, except to the extent to which the same shall be a part of income from any business, trade, profession, or occupation carried on in the state, subject to taxation under that act.

Constitutional law — privileges and immunities — taxing incomes of nonresidents — exemptions.

6. The discrimination against citizens of Connecticut and New Jersey, produced by the provision of the New York Income Tax Law which denies to all nonresidents, without special reference to citizenship, the exemptions accorded to residents, viz., $1,000 of the income of a single person, $2,000 in the case of a married person, and $200 additional for each dependent, cannot be upheld on the theory that nonresidents have untaxed income derived from sources in their home states or elsewhere outside of the state of New York, corresponding to the amount upon which residents of the latter state are exempt from taxation under the act.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. a, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — privileges and immunities — taxing income of nonresidents — discrimination.

7. A discrimination by the state of New York in its income tax legislation against citizens of adjoining states would not be cured were those states to establish like discriminations against citizens of the state of New York.

Argued December 15 and 16, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a decree enjoining the enforcement of the Income Tax Law of that state as against nonresidents. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

See same case below, on motion to dismiss bill, 262 Fed. 576.

Mr. James S. Y. Ivins argued the cause, and, with Mr. Charles D. Newton, Attorney General of New York, and Mr. E. C. Aiken, filed a brief for appellant:

The power of taxation, inherent in a sovereign, includes the power to lay a tax upon incomes.

M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 429, 4 L. ed. 579, 607.

Whether a tax levied upon incomes from all sources is a direct or an indirect tax was a question of prime importance in considering the validity of Federal income taxes, prior to the adoption of the 16th Amendment, but it has no importance since the adoption of that Amendment, and it never had any importance with respect to taxes laid by the states.

Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. ed. 759, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 912; William E. Peck & Co. v. Lowe, 247 U. S. 165, 62 L. ed. 1049, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432.

The characterization of a tax by administrative officers, by the phraseology of the statute, or by the opinion of other courts, is not controlling. This court will look only at the practical effect of the tax as it is enforced.

Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U. S. 292, 294, 62 L. ed. 295, 297, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 126.

The underlying reason for taxation: the support of the government in its protection of the lives, liberty, and property of those having life, liberty, or property within its borders extends equally to residents and nonresidents, citizens and aliens.

Duer v. Small, 4 Blatchf. 263, Fed. Cas. No. 4,116.

Unless restrained by provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the state as to the mode, form, and extent of the taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction.

State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 319, 21 L. ed. 179, 186.

The doctrine that movable property follows the person for purposes of taxation has given way to the doctrine that where property has a situs, there it is taxable.

The classification of residents and nonresidents by the New York income tax is reasonable.

Mr. Jerome L. Cheney also argued the cause for appellant.

Messrs. Laurence Arnold Tanzer, William P. Burr, William S. Rann, and William J. Wallin filed a brief as amici curiæ:

The difference in the base of the tax necessarily arises from the difference between the extent of a state's jurisdiction over residents and over nonresidents, respectively.

Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 499, 25 L. ed. 558, 562; Hawley v. Malden, 232 U. S. 1, 11, 58 L. ed. 477, 482, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 842; Fidelity & C. Trust Co. v. Louisville, 245 U. S. 54, 58, 62 L. ed. 145, 148, L.R.A.1918C, 124, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 204, 50 L. ed. 150, 153, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, 4 Ann. Cas. 493; State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179.

The difference in the base of the tax, being forced upon the state by reason of its limited jurisdiction, cannot be regarded as an arbitrary discrimination.

The difference in the exemptions and deductions granted to residents and nonresidents corresponds to and bears a reasonable relation to the difference in the base of the tax.

The practical effect of denying or unduly limiting the power of a state to tax nonresidents would be a serious impairment of that power of taxation which is essential to sovereignty.

Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 166 U. S. 185, 41 L. ed. 965, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604.

Messrs. Louis H. Porter and Archibald Cox argued the cause and filed a brief for appellee:

The provisions of the statute relating to the taxation of nonresidents are inconsistent with the "due process of law" clause of the 14th Amendment, because they tax persons or things outside the jurisdiction of the state of New York, and within the jurisdiction of other states.

The tax here in question is a subjective tax imposing personal liability upon the person receiving and enjoying the "net income," which merely measures the burden imposed on the taxpayer in personam.

One limitation upon the power of taxation of any state is that such power can be legally exercised only upon the assumption of an equivalent rendered to the taxpayer in the protection of his person or his property.

Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 50 L. ed. 150, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, 4 Ann. Cas. 493.

Any person is at liberty to pursue any lawful calling, and to do so in his own way, not encroaching upon the rights of others. This general right cannot be taken away. It is not competent, therefore, to forbid any person or class of persons, whether citizens or resident aliens, offering their services in lawful business, or to subject others to penalties for employing them.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 889.

The tax in question is not a property tax, and has no relation to property as such.

That the United States government taxes the incomes of nonresident aliens from property or business within the United States is no justification for taxation by New York of income earned by a nonresident within the state.

The scheme of the Federal Constitution was to unite the people of the various states in one Federal citizenship, and to put an end to those local discriminations and impositions by one state upon the citizens of another state, which had so seriously impaired the efficiency of the government under the Confederation.

Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180, 19 L. ed. 357, 360.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit in equity, brought in the district court by appellee against appellant as comptroller of the state of New York to obtain an injunction restraining the enforcement of the Income Tax Law of that state (Laws 1919, chap. 627) as against complainant, upon the ground of its repugnance to the Constitution of the United States because violating the interstate commerce clause, impairing the obligation of contracts, depriving citizens of the states of Connecticut and New Jersey, employed by complainant, of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by citizens of the state of New York, depriving complainant and its nonresident employees of their [73] property without due process of law, and denying to such employees the equal protection of the laws. A motion to dismiss the bill—equivalent to a demurrer—was denied upon the ground that the act violated § 2 of art. 4 of the Constitution by discriminating against nonresidents in the exemptions allowed from taxable income; an answer was filed, raising no question of fact; in due course there was a final decree in favor of complainant; and defendant took an appeal to this court under § 238, Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1157, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1215, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 794].

The act (§ 351) imposes an annual tax upon every resident of the state with respect to his net income as defined in the act, at specified rates, and provides also: "A like tax is hereby imposed and shall be levied, collected and paid annually, at the rates specified in this section, upon and with respect to the entire net income as herein defined, except as hereinafter provided, from all property owned and from every business, trade, profession or occupation carried on in this state by natural persons not residents of the state." Section 359 defines gross income, and contains this paragraph: "3. In the case of taxpayers other than residents, gross income includes only the gross income from sources within the state, but shall not include annuities, interest on bank deposits, interest on bonds, notes or other interest-bearing obligations or dividends from corporations, except to the extent to which the same shall be a part of income from any business, trade, profession or occupation carried on in this state subject to taxation under this article." In § 360 provision is made for deducting in the computation of net income expenses, taxes, losses, depreciation charges, etc.; but, by ¶ 11 of the same section, "in the case of a taxpayer other than a resident of the state the deductions allowed in this section shall be allowed only if, and to the extent that, they are connected with income arising from sources within the state; . . ." By § 362, [74] certain exemptions are allowed to any resident individual taxpayer, viz., in the case of a single person a personal exemption of $1,000, in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, $2,000; and $200 additional for each dependent person under eighteen years of age or mentally or physically defective. The next section reads as follows: "Sec. 363. Credit for taxes in case of taxpayers other than residents of the state. Whenever a taxpayer other than a resident of the state has become liable to income tax to the state or country where he resides upon his net income for the taxable year, derived from sources within this state and subject to taxation under this article, the comptroller shall credit the amount of income tax payable by him under this article with such proportion of the tax so payable by him to the state or country where he resides as his income subject to taxation under this article bears to his entire income upon which the tax so payable to such other state or country was imposed; provided that such credit shall be allowed only if the laws of said state or country grant a substantially similar credit to residents of this state subject to income tax under such laws." Sec. 366 in terms requires that every "withholding agent" (including employers) shall deduct and withhold 2 per centum from all salaries, wages, etc., payable to nonresidents, where the amount paid to any individual equals or exceeds $1,000 in the year, and shall pay the tax to the comptroller. This applies to a resident employee, also, unless he files a certificate showing his residence address within the state.

Complainant, a Connecticut corporation doing business in New York and elsewhere, has employees who are residents, some of Connecticut, others of New Jersey, but are occupied in whole or in part in complainant's business in New York. Many of them have annual salaries or fixed compensation exceeding $1,000 per year, and the [75] amount required by the act to be withheld by complainant from the salaries of such nonresident employees is in excess of $3,000 per year. Most of these persons are engaged under term contracts calling for stipulated wages or salaries for a specified period.

The bill sets up that defendant, as comptroller of the state of New York, threatens to enforce the provisions of the statute against complainant, requires it to deduct and withhold from the salaries and wages payable to its employees residing in Connecticut or New Jersey and citizens of those states respectively, engaged in whole or in part in complainant's business in the state of New York, the taxes provided in the statute, and threatens to enforce against complainant the penalties provided by the act if it fails to do so; that the act is unconstitutional for the reasons above specified; and that if complainant does withhold the taxes as required it will be subjected to many actions by its employees for reimbursement of the sums so withheld. No question is made about complainant's right to resort to equity for relief; hence we come at once to the constitutional questions.

That the state of New York has jurisdiction to impose a tax of this kind upon the incomes of nonresidents arising from any business, trade, profession, or occupation carried on within its borders, enforcing payment so far as it can by the exercise of a just control over persons and property within the state, as by garnishment of credits (of which the withholding provision of the New York law is the practical equivalent), and that such a tax, so enforced, does not violate the due process of law provision of the 14th Amendment, is settled by our decision in Shaffer v. Carter, this day announced [252 U. S. 37, ante, 445, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221], involving the Income Tax Law of the state of Oklahoma. That there is no unconstitutional discrimination against citizens of other states in confining the deduction of expenses, losses, etc., in the case of nonresident taxpayers, to such as are [76] connected with income arising from sources within the taxing state, likewise is settled by that decision.

It is not here asserted that the tax is a burden upon interstate commerce; the point having been abandoned in this court.

The contention that an unconstitutional discrimination against noncitizens arises out of the provision of § 366, confining the withholding at source to the income of nonresidents, is unsubstantial. That provision does not in any wise increase the burden of the tax upon nonresidents, but merely recognizes the fact that as to them the state imposes no personal liability, and hence adopts a convenient substitute for it. See Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 239, 33 L. ed. 892, 895, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533.

Nor has complainant on its own account any just ground of complaint by reason of being required to adjust its system of accounting and paying salaries and wages to the extent required to fulfil the duty of deducting and withholding the tax. This cannot be deemed an unreasonable regulation of its conduct of business in New York. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 153 U. S. 628, 38 L. ed. 846, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 952, cited in behalf of complainant, is not in point. In that case the state of Pennsylvania granted to a railroad company organized under the laws of New York and having its principal place of business in that state the right to construct a portion of its road through Pennsylvania, upon prescribed terms which were assented to and complied with by the company and were deemed to constitute a contract, not subject to impairment or modification through subsequent legislation by the state of Pennsylvania except to the extent of establishing reasonable regulations touching the management of the business done and the property owned by the company in that state, not materially interfering with or obstructing the substantial enjoyment of the rights previously granted. Afterwards, Pennsylvania undertook by statute to require [77] the company, when making payment of coupons upon bonds previously issued by it, payable at its office in the city of New York, to withhold taxes assessed by the state of Pennsylvania against residents of that state because of ownership of such bonds. The coupons were payable to bearer, and when they were presented for payment it was practically impossible for the company to ascertain who were the real owners, or whether they were owned by the same parties who owned the bonds. The statute was held to be an unreasonable regulation, and hence to amount to an impairment of the obligation of the contract.

In the case at bar complainant, although it is a Connecticut corporation and has its principal place of business in that state, is exercising the privilege of carrying on business in the state of New York without any contract limiting the state's power of regulation. The taxes required to be withheld are payable with respect to that portion only of the salaries of its employees which is earned within the state of New York. It might pay such salaries, or this portion of them, at its place of business in New York; and the fact that it may be more convenient to pay them in Connecticut is not sufficient to deprive the state of New York of the right to impose such a regulation. It is true complainant asserts that the act impairs the obligation of contracts between it and its employees; but there is no averment that any such contract made before the passage of the act required the wages or salaries to be paid in the state of Connecticut, or contained other provisions in anywise conflicting with the requirement of withholding.

The district court, not passing upon the above questions, held that the act, in granting to residents exemptions denied to nonresidents, violated the provision of § 2 of art. 4 of the Federal Constitution: "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" and, notwithstanding [78] the elaborate and ingenious argument submitted by appellant to the contrary, we are constrained to affirm the ruling.

The purpose of the provision came under consideration in Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180, 19 L. ed. 357, 360, where the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Field, said: "It was undoubtedly the object of the clause in question to place the citizens of each state upon the same footing with citizens of other states, so far as the advantages resulting from citizenship in those states are concerned. It relieves them from the disabilities of alienage in other states; it inhibits discriminating legislation against them by other states; it gives them the right of free ingress into other states, and egress from them; it insures to them in other states the same freedom possessed by the citizens of those states in the acquisition and enjoyment of property and in the pursuit of happiness; and it secures to them in other states the equal protection of their laws. It has been justly said that no provision in the Constitution has tended so strongly to constitute the citizens of the United States one people as this." And in Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449, holding a discriminatory state tax upon nonresident traders to be void, the court, by Mr. Justice Clifford, said (p. 430): "Beyond doubt those words [privileges and immunities] are words of very comprehensive meaning, but it will be sufficient to say that the clause plainly and unmistakably secures and protects the right of a citizen of one state to pass into any other state of the Union for the purpose of engaging in lawful commerce, trade, or business without molestation; to acquire personal property; to take and hold real estate; to maintain actions in the courts of the state; and to be exempt from any higher taxes or excises than are imposed by the state upon its own citizens."

Of course the terms "resident" and "citizen" are not synonymous, and in some cases the distinction is important [79] (La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465, 470, 63 L. ed. 362, 365, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160); but a general taxing scheme such as the one under consideration, if it discriminates against all nonresidents, has the necessary effect of including in the discrimination those who are citizens of other states; and, if there be no reasonable ground for the diversity of treatment, it abridges the privileges and immunities to which such citizens are entitled. In Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 247, 43 L. ed. 432, 435, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165, 176 U. S. 59, 67, 44 L. ed. 371, 374, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307, the court held that a statute of Tennessee, declaring the terms upon which a foreign corporation might carry on business and hold property in that state, which gave to its creditors residing in Tennessee priority over all creditors residing elsewhere, without special reference to whether they were citizens or not, must be regarded as contravening the "privileges and immunities" clause.

The nature and effect of the crucial discrimination in the present case are manifest. Section 362, in the case of residents, exempts from taxation $1,000 of the income of a single person, $2,000 in the case of a married person, and $200 additional for each dependent. A nonresident taxpayer has no similar exemption; but by § 363, if liable to an income tax in his own state, including income derived from sources within New York and subject to taxation under this act, he is entitled to a credit upon the income tax otherwise payable to the state of New York by the same proportion of the tax payable to the state of his residence as his income subject to taxation by the New York act bears to his entire income taxed in his own state; "provided, that such credit shall be allowed only if the laws of said state . . . grant a substantially similar credit to residents of this state subject to income tax under such law." [1]

[80] In the concrete, the particular incidence of the discrimination is upon citizens of Connecticut and New Jersey, neither of which states has an income tax law. A considerable number of complainant's employees, residents and citizens of one or the other of those states, spend their working time at its office in the city of New York, and earn their salaries there. The case is typical; it being a matter of common knowledge that from necessity, due to the geographical situation of that city, in close proximity to the neighboring states, many thousands of men and women, residents and citizens of those states, go daily from their homes to the city and earn their livelihood there. They pursue their several occupations side by side with residents of the state of New York,—in effect competing with them as to wages, salaries, and other terms of employment. Whether they must pay a tax upon the first $1,000 or $2,000 of income, while their associates and competitors who reside in New York do not, makes a substantial difference. Under the circumstances as disclosed, we are unable to find adequate ground for the discrimination, and are constrained to hold that it is an unwarranted denial to the citizens of Connecticut and New Jersey of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by citizens of New York. This is not a case of occasional or accidental inequality due to circumstances personal to the taxpayer (see Amoskeag [81] Sav. Bank v. Purdy, 231 U. S. 373, 393, 394, 58 L. ed. 274, 282, 283, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114; Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S. 525, 543, 63 L. ed. 1124, 1132, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2), but a general rule, operating to the disadvantage of all nonresidents, including those who are citizens of the neighboring states, and favoring all residents, including those who are citizens of the taxing state.

[1] Reading the statute literally, there would appear to be an additional discrimination against nonresidents in that under § 366 the "withholding agent" (employer) is required to withhold 2 per cent from all salaries, wages, etc., payable to any individual nonresident amounting to $1,000 or more in the year; whereas by § 351 the tax upon residents (indeed, upon nonresidents likewise, so far as this section goes) is only 1 per centum upon the first $10,000 of net income. It is said, however, that the discrepancy arose through an amendment made to § 351 while the bill was pending in the legislature, no corresponding amendment having been made in § 366. In view of this, and taking the whole of the act together, the attorney general has advised the comptroller that § 366 requires withholding of only 1 per centum upon the first $10,000 of income. And the comptroller has issued regulations to that effect. Hence we treat the discrepancy as if it did not exist.

It cannot be deemed to be counterbalanced by the provision of ¶ 3 of § 359, which excludes from the income of nonresident taxpayers "annuities, interest on bank deposits, interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations or dividends from corporations, except to the extent to which the same shall be a part of income from any business, trade, profession or occupation carried on in this state, subject to taxation under this article." This provision is not so conditioned as probably to benefit nonresidents to a degree corresponding to the discrimination against them; it seems to have been designed rather (as is avowed in appellant's brief) to preserve the preëminence of New York city as a financial center.

Nor can the discrimination be upheld, as is attempted to be done, upon the theory that nonresidents have untaxed income derived from sources in their home states or elsewhere outside of the state of New York, corresponding to the amount upon which residents of that state are exempt from taxation under this act. The discrimination is not conditioned upon the existence of such untaxed income; and it would be rash to assume that nonresidents taxable in New York under this law, as a class, are receiving additional income from outside sources equivalent to the amount of the exemptions that are accorded to citizens of New York and denied to them.

In the brief submitted by the attorney general of New York in behalf of appellant, it is said that the framers of the act, in embodying in it the provision for unequal treatment of the residents of other states with [82] respect to the exemptions, looked forward to the speedy adoption of an income tax by the adjoining states; in which event, injustice to their citizens on the part of New York could be avoided by providing similar exemptions, similarly conditioned. This, however, is wholly speculative. New York has no authority to legislate for the adjoining states; and we must pass upon its statute with respect to its effect and operation in the existing situation. But besides, in view of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, a discrimination by the state of New York against the citizens of adjoining states would not be cured were those states to establish like discriminations against citizens of the state of New York. A state may not barter away the right, conferred upon its citizens by the Constitution of the United States, to enjoy the privileges and immunities of citizens when they go into other states. Nor can discrimination be corrected by retaliation; to prevent this was one of the chief ends sought to be accomplished by the adoption of the Constitution.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds concurs in the result.

v.

NORTHERN TRUST COMPANY, Executor of Mary Schreiber,[1] Eva A. Woodworth, and Margaret A. Smalley.

Federal district court and affirmed by a circuit court of appeals, the trial court's jurisdiction will not ordinarily be denied on the theory that the requisite jurisdictional amount was not involved, where the action was in tort, the alleged damages exceeded the prescribed amount, the declaration discloses nothing rendering such a recovery impossible, and no bad faith appears.

[For other cases, see Courts, 887–927, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued January 30, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Northern Division, in favor of plaintiffs in an action by stockholders in a national bank against a director, to recover damages suffered by reason of his action as such director. Affirmed.

See same case below, — C. C. A. —, 251 Fed. 881.

Mr. Thomas A. E. Weadock argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Edward S. Clark argued the cause, and, with Mr. John C. Weadock, filed a brief for defendants in error.

Memorandum opinion under direction of the court, by Mr. Justice McReynolds:

Each of the three defendants in error instituted a suit against plaintiff in error for damages suffered by reason of his action as a director of the Old Second National Bank, Bay City, Michigan. These were consolidated in the district court, and thereafter all parties stipulated that, as the facts were approximately the same as in Woodworth v. Chesbrough (No. 137), the [84] "causes shall in all respects and as to all parties therein be governed and concluded by the final result in the said case," and "that if and when final judgment is entered upon the verdict heretofore rendered in said case Number 137, or on any verdict that may hereafter be rendered therein, and when proceedings (if any) for the review of said judgment have been concluded or abandoned so that execution may be issued thereon, then judgment shall be forthwith entered and execution issued in the above entitled causes," for specified amounts.

A judgment against Chesbrough in No. 137 having been affirmed here (244 U. S. 72, 61 L. ed. 1000, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 579), the district court, purporting to enforce the stipulation, entered judgments for defendants in error; and this action was properly approved by the circuit court of appeals. — C. C. A. —, 251 Fed. 881. See 116 C. C. A. 465, 195 Fed. 875, 137 C. C. A. 482, 221 Fed. 912.

Plain provisions of the stipulation were rightly applied. The objection, based upon alleged insufficiency of the amount involved, which plaintiff in error urges to the district court's jurisdiction of the cause first instituted by Mrs. Smalley in the state court and thereafter removed upon his petition, is without merit. The action is in tort; alleged damages exceed the prescribed amount; the declaration discloses nothing rendering such a recovery impossible; no bad faith appears. At this stage of the cause it would require very clear error to justify a negation of the trial court's jurisdiction. Smithers v. Smith, 204 U. S. 632, 642, 643, 51 L. ed. 656, 660, 661, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 297.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Argued January 22 and 23, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio to review a judgment which sustained a demurrer to an indictment charging a violation of the Sherman Anti-trust Act. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Special Assistant to the Attorney General Mitchell and Solicitor General King argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

The indictment charges an offense under the decisions of this court.

United States v. Miller, 223 U. S. 599, 602, 56 L. ed. 568, 569, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 323; United States v. Carter, 231 U. S. 492, 493, 58 L. ed. 330, 331, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 173; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376; United States v. Colgate & Co. 250 U. S. 300, 63 L. ed. 992, 7 A.L.R. 443, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465.

The district court erroneously construed § 1 of the Sherman Act, which prohibits combinations in restraint of trade, as only applying where there is a violation of § 2, which prohibits monopolization.

Resale price-fixing combinations are condemned because of their tendency to injure the public interest.

Resale price-fixing combinations are not saved from condemnation by their advantages to the participants.

Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 408, 55 L. ed. 518, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376.

Mr. Frank M. Avery argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Eugene V. Myers, Carl Everett Whitney, and Earl A. Darr, filed a brief for defendant in error:

The indictment is not sufficient in form or substance to charge the defendant with an offense.

Cas. 1918C, 447.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant in error, a New York corporation, manufactured at Brooklyn, under letters patent, valves, gauges, and other accessories for use in connection with automobile tires, and regularly sold and shipped large quantities of these to manufacturers and jobbers throughout the United States. It was indicted in the district court, northern district of Ohio, for engaging in a combination rendered criminal by § 1 of the Sherman Act of July 2, 1890 (chap. 647, 26 Stat. at L. 209, Comp Stat. § 8820, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 644), which declares illegal "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations." After interpreting the indictment as indicated by quotations from its opinion which follow, the district court sustained a demurrer thereto, basing the judgment upon construction of that act (— Fed. —):

"The substantive allegations of this indictment are that defendant is engaged in manufacturing valves, valve parts, pneumatic-pressure gauges, and various other accessories; that it sells and ships large quantities of such articles to tire manufacturers and jobbers in the northern district of Ohio and throughout the United States; that these tire manufacturers and jobbers resell and reship large quantities of these products to (a) jobbers and vehicle manufacturers, (b) retail dealers, and (c) to the public, both within and without the respective states into which the products are shipped; that these acts have been committed within three years next preceding the presentation of this indictment and within this district; that the defendant executed, and [95] caused all the said tire manufacturers and jobbers to whom it sold its said products to execute with it, uniform contracts concerning resales of such products; that every manufacturer and jobber was informed by the defendant and well knew when executing such contracts that identical contracts were being executed and adhered to by the other manufacturers and jobbers; that these contracts thus executed purported to contain a grant of a license from the defendant to resell its said products at prices fixed by it to (a) jobbers and vehicle manufacturers similarly licensed, (b) retail dealers, and (c) the consuming public; that all these contracts provided (that the) [concerning] products thus sold to tire manufacturers and jobbers (provided) that they should not resell such products at prices other than those fixed by the defendant. Copies of these contracts are identified by exhibit numbers and attached to the indictment. It is further charged that the defendant furnished to the tire manufacturers and jobbers who entered into such contracts lists of uniform prices, such as are shown in said exhibits, which the defendant fixed for the resale of its said products to (a) jobbers and vehicle manufacturers, (b) retail dealers, and (c) the consuming public, respectively; and that the defendant uniformly refused to sell and ship its products to tire manufacturers and jobbers who did not enter into such contracts and adhere to the uniform resale prices fixed and listed by the defendant. Further, that tire manufacturers and jobbers in the northern district of Ohio and throughout the United States uniformly resold defendant's products at uniform prices fixed by the defendant and uniformly refused to resell such products at lower prices, whereby competition was suppressed and the prices of such products to retail dealers and the consuming public were maintained and enhanced.

"Thus it will be observed that the contract, combination, [96] or conspiracy charged comes merely to this: That the defendant has agreed, combined, or conspired with tire manufacturers and with jobbers by the selling or agreeing to sell valves, valve parts, pneumatic pressure gauges, and various accessories, with the further understanding or agreement that in making resales thereof they will sell only at certain fixed prices. It will be further observed that the retailers, to whom the jobbers in ordinary course of trade would naturally sell rather than to the consuming public, and who in turn sell and distribute these articles to and among the ultimate consumers, are not included within the alleged combination or conspiracy.

"The so-called license agreements, exhibited with the indictment, are, in my opinion, both in substance and effect, only selling agreements. The title to the valves, valve parts, pneumatic pressure gauges, and other automobile accessories passed to the so-called licensees and licensed jobbers."

The court further said:

"Defendant urges that there is a manifest inconsistency between the reasoning, if not between the holdings, of these two cases [Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, and United States v. Colgate Co. 250 U. S. 300, 63 L. ed. 992, 7 A.L.R. 443, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465]; that if the basic principles announced in the latter case are to be taken in the ordinary sense imported by the language, the present case falls within the Colgate Case, and that, properly construed, neither § 1 nor § 2 of the Sherman Anti-trust Law makes the defendant's conduct a crime. The Dr. Miles Medical Co. Case, standing alone, would seem to require that this demurrer be overruled and a holding that the Sherman Anti-trust Law is violated and a crime committed, merely upon a showing of the making by defendant and two or more jobbers of the agreements set up in the indictment; certainly if the jobbers were competitors in the [97] same territory. That case has been frequently cited as establishing this proposition. . . . The retailers are not in the present case included. They may compete freely with one another and may even give away the articles purchased by them. No restriction is imposed which prevents them from selling to the consumer at any price, even though it be at a ruinous sacrifice and less than the price made to them by the jobber. Personally, and with all due respect, permit me to say that I can see no real difference upon the facts between the Dr. Miles Medical Co. Case and the Colgate Co. Case. The only difference is that in the former the arrangement for marketing its product was put in writing, whereas in the latter the wholesale and retail dealers observed the prices fixed by the vendor. This is a distinction without a difference. The tacit acquiescence of the wholesalers and retailers in the prices thus fixed is the equivalent, for all practical purposes, of an express agreement.

"Granting the fundamental proposition stated in the Colgate Co. Case, that the manufacturer has an undoubted right to specify resale prices and refuse to deal with anyone who fails to maintain the same, or, as further stated, the act does not restrict the long-recognized right of a trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to the parties with whom he will deal, and that he, of course, may announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell, it seems to me that it is a distinction without a difference to say that he may do so by the subterfuges and devices set forth in the opinion, and not violate the Sherman Anti-trust Act; yet if he had done the same thing in the form of a written agreement, adequate only to effectuate the same purpose, he would be guilty of a violation of the law. Manifestly, therefore, the decision in the Dr. Miles Medical Co. Case must rest upon some other ground than the mere fact that there were [98] agreements between the manufacturer and the wholesalers.

. . . . . .

"The point, however, which I wish to emphasize, is that the allegations of this indictment, not alleging any purpose, or facts from which such a purpose can be inferred, to monopolize interstate trade, within the prohibition and meaning of § 2 of the Sherman Anti-trust Act and the last clause of § 2 of the Clayton Act [October 15, 1914, 38 Stat. at L. 730, chap. 323, Comp. Stat. § 8835a, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 730], do not charge a crime under § 1 of the Sherman Anti-trust Act as that act should be construed."

Our opinion in United States v. Colgate Co. declared quite plainly:

That upon a writ of error under the Criminal Appeals Act (March 2, 1907, chap. 2564, 34 Stat. at L. 1246, Comp. Stat. § 1704, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 149) "we have no authority to revise the mere interpretation of an indictment, and are confined to ascertaining whether the court, in a case under review, erroneously construed the statute." "We must accept that court's interpretation of the indictments and confine our review to the question of the construction of the statute involved in its decision." That we were confronted by an uncertain interpretation of an indictment itself couched in rather vague and general language, the meaning of the opinion below being the subject of serious controversy. The "defendant maintains that, looking at the whole opinion, it plainly construes the indictment as alleging only recognition of the manufacturer's undoubted right to specify resale prices and refuse to deal with anyone who failed to maintain the same." "The position of the defendant is more nearly in accord with the whole opinion, and must be accepted. And as counsel for the government were careful to state on the argument that this conclusion would require affirmation of the judgment below, an extended discussion of the principles involved is unnecessary." And further: "The purpose of the Sherman Act is to prohibit monopolies, contracts, and combinations which probably would unduly interfere with [99] the free exercise of their rights by those engaged, or who wish to engage, in trade and commerce; in a word, to preserve the right of freedom to trade. In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the act does not restrict the long-recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal. And, of course, he may announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell."

The court below misapprehended the meaning and effect of the opinion and judgment in that cause. We had no intention to overrule or modify the doctrine of Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. where the effort was to destroy the dealers' independent discretion through restrictive agreements. Under the interpretation adopted by the trial court and necessarily accepted by us, the indictment failed to charge that Colgate Company made agreements, either express or implied, which undertook to obligate vendees to observe specified resale prices; and it was treated "as alleging only recognition of the manufacturer's undoubted right to specify resale prices and refuse to deal with anyone who fails to maintain the same."

It seems unnecessary to dwell upon the obvious difference between the situation presented when a manufacturer merely indicates his wishes concerning prices and declines further dealings with all who fail to observe them, and one where he enters into agreements—whether express or implied from a course of dealing or other circumstances—with all customers throughout the different states, which undertake to bind them to observe fixed resale prices. In the first, the manufacturer but exercises his independent discretion concerning his customers, and there is no contract or combination which imposes any limitation on the purchaser. In the second, the parties [100] are combined through agreements designed to take away dealers' control of their own affairs, and thereby destroy competition and restrain the free and natural flow of trade amongst the states.

The principles approved in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. should have been applied. The judgment below must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Mr. Justice Clarke concurs in the result.

MILWAUKEE ELECTRIC RAILWAY & LIGHT COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF WISCONSIN EX REL. CITY OF MILWAUKEE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 100–106.)

Constitutional law — impairing contract obligations — street railway franchise — paving ordinance.

1. A municipal ordinance requiring a street railway company to bear the cost of paving with asphalt upon a concrete foundation, like the rest of a newly paved street, that part of such street which lies between the tracks and for a distance of 1 foot outside, does not, although theretofore the street had been paved from curb to curb with macadam, impair the obligation of the street railway company's franchise contract under which its duty extends to keeping "in good repair the roadway between the rails and for 1 foot on the outside of each rail as laid, and the space between the two inside rails of its double tracks with the same material as the city shall have last used to pave or repave these spaces and the street previous to such repairs," unless the railway company and the city shall agree upon some other material.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, 1435–1439, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — due process of law — requiring street railway company to pave street — reducing income.

2. A street railway company's contractual duty to repave that part of a street which lies between its tracks and for 1 foot outside cannot be evaded on the theory that this additional burden will reduce its income below a reasonable return on the investment.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. b, 4, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Constitutional law — equal protection of the laws — inconsistent judicial decision.

3. One against whom a judicial decision has been rendered can base no rights, under the equal protection of the laws clause of the Federal Constitution, upon a later decision between strangers which is asserted to be irreconcilable on a matter of law with the earlier decision. This constitutional provision does not assure uniformity of judicial decisions.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV a, 1, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued November 10, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin to review a judgment which, on a second appeal, affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court of Milwaukee County, in that state, awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel a street railway company to pave that part of a street occupied by its tracks. Affirmed.

See same case below, on first appeal, 165 Wis. 230, 161 N. W. 745; on second appeal, 166 Wis. 163, 164 N. W. 844.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

As to returns to which public service corporations are entitled—see note to Bellamy v. Missouri & N. A. R. Co. L.R.A.1915A, 5.

As to constitutional equality of privileges, immunities, and protection, generally—see note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 L.R.A. 579.

As to liability of street railway for paving assessment—see note to Shreveport v. Prescott, 46 L.R.A. 193.

And see note to this case as reported in 10 A.L.R. —.

Mr. Edwin S. Mack argued the cause, and, with Messrs. George P. Miller and Arthur W. Fairchild, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Practical construction may always be resorted to when there is ambiguity. We submit that the meaning of the language used is precisely that for which we contend. If it be said that there is any doubt as to our being right, does the opposite intent clearly appear? If it does not, then the construction becomes not merely helpful in interpretation, but conclusive.

Mr. Clifton Williams argued the cause and filed a brief for defendant in error:

This case is exactly like the case of Southern Wisconsin R. Co. v. Madison, 240 U. S. 457–462, 60 L. ed. 739–743, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400.

The supreme court of the state of Wisconsin has not changed its position in Superior v. Duluth Street R. Co. 166 Wis. 487, 165 N. W. 1081, since it rendered the judgment in the case at bar.

Madison v. Southern Wisconsin R. Co. 156 Wis. 352, — A.L.R. —, 146 N. W. 492; State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 165 Wis. 236, 161 N. W. 745.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court:

A petition for a writ of mandamus was brought by the city of Milwaukee in a lower court of the state of Wisconsin [102] to compel the Milwaukee Electric Railway & Light Company to pave at its own expense, with asphalt upon a concrete foundation, that portion of Centre street, called the railway zone, which lies between the tracks and for 1 foot outside of them. The paving had been specifically ordered on November 8, 1915, by a city ordinance after the city had laid such a pavement on all of the street except the railway zone.

Theretofore the street had been paved from curb to curb with macadam. The company admitted that the railway zone was in need of repaving at that time; but it insisted that, under an ordinance of January 2, 1900, which constituted its franchise to lay tracks on Centre street, it was entitled to repair with macadam, and could not be compelled to repave with asphalt.

The case was heard in the trial court on a demurrer to the amended return. The demurrer was sustained; and the decision was affirmed by the supreme court (165 Wis. 230, 161 N. W. 745). The company having failed, after remittitur, to file an amended return or take further action, judgment was entered by the trial court awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus, directing it to pave the railway zone as directed in the ordinance. This judgment also was affirmed by the supreme court (166 Wis. 163, 164 N. W. 844). The case comes here on writ of error under § 237 of the Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1156, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1214, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 723]. The single question presented is whether the ordinance of November 8, 1915, is void either under § 10 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution, as impairing contract rights of the company, or under the 14th Amendment, as depriving it of property without due process of law. The ordinance of January 2, 1900, which is the contract alleged to be impaired by the later ordinance, provides as follows:

"Sec. 2. . . . It shall be the duty of said railway company at all times to keep in good repair the roadway between the rails and for 1 foot on the outside of each rail [103] as laid, and the space between the two inside rails of its double tracks with the same material as the city shall have last used to pave or repave these spaces and the street previous to such repairs, unless the railway company and the board of public works of said city shall agree upon some other material, and said company shall then use the material agreed upon. . . ."

The company contends that when this section is read in connection with § 9, it clearly appears that the obligation to repave cannot be imposed.

First: The supreme court of the state held that the language of § 2 was not distinguishable from that involved in earlier cases in which it had held that a duty to keep "in proper repair," without qualification, was broad enough to require repaving and repairing with the same material with which the street was repaved. When this court is called upon to decide whether state legislation impairs the obligation of a contract, it must determine for itself whether there is a contract, and what its obligation is, as well as whether the obligation has been impaired. Detroit United R. Co. v. Michigan, 242 U. S. 238, 249, 61 L. ed. 272, 273, P.U.R.1917B, 1010, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87. But, as stated in Southern Wisconsin R. Co. v. Madison, 240 U. S. 457, 461, 60 L. ed. 739, 742, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400, "the mere fact that, without the state decision, we might have hesitated, is not enough to lead us to overrule that decision upon a fairly doubtful point." Among the cases relied upon by the state court is State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 151 Wis. 520, 139 N. W. 396, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 123, which was cited by this court in the Madison Case (p. 461) as a "persuasive decision [s] that the obligation to keep the space 'in proper repair' . . . extends to" repaving the railway zone with asphalt when the rest of the street is being repaved with that material. But the company points to the clause in the ordinance of January 2, 1900, which provides for repair "with the same material as the city shall have last used to pave or repair these spaces and the street," [104] and insists that its obligation is, in any event, limited to repaving with such material as the city had last used between the rails. This would put upon the city the burden of paving the whole street in case of any innovation in paving save by agreement of the company and the city. It is not a reasonable construction of the provision.

Second: Granted the duty to repave, and to repave with material other than that last used in the space between the tracks, was it reasonable for the city to require that the pavement be of asphalt upon a concrete foundation—a pavement which involved larger expense? The city alleged in its petition that the use of macadam by the railway was unreasonable, and that it is physically impossible to make a water-tight bond between the water-bound macadam and the asphalt, so as to prevent water from seeping through under the asphalt, causing it to deteriorate in warm weather and to be lifted by freezing in cold weather. The allegation was not expressly admitted by the return, and must be deemed to have been covered by its general denial of all allegations not expressly admitted; but neither party took steps to have this formal issue disposed of. The case differs, therefore, in this respect from the Madison Case, where there was an express finding that repavement of the railway zone with stone would have been unsuitable when the rest of the street was of asphalt (p. 462). The difference is not material. As the ordinance did not, as a matter of contract, preclude regulation in respect to paving, it was for the city to determine, in the first instance, what the public necessity and convenience demanded. Compare Fair Haven & W. R. Co. v. New Haven, 203 U. S. 379, 51 L. ed. 237, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 74. We cannot say that its requirement that the railway zone be paved like the rest of the street with asphalt upon a concrete foundation was inherently arbitrary or unreasonable.

Third: The company insists that the ordinance of [105] November 8, 1915, is unreasonable and void, also, for an entirely different reason. It alleges in its return that for a long time prior to that date the earnings from its street railway system in Milwaukee were considerably under 6 per cent of the value of the property used and useful in the business, and were less than a reasonable return. It contends that this allegation was admitted by the demurrer; and, that to impose upon the company the additional burden of paving with asphalt will reduce its income below a reasonable return on the investment, and thus deprive it of its property in violation of the 14th Amendment. The supreme court of the state answered the contention by saying: "The company can at any time apply to the Railroad Commission and have the rate made reasonable." The financial condition of a public service corporation is a fact properly to be considered when determining the reasonableness of an order directing an unremunerative extension of facilities, or forbidding their abandonment. Mississippi R. Commission v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 244 U. S. 388, 61 L. ed. 1216, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602; New York ex rel. New York & Q. Gas Co. v. McCall, 245 U. S. 345, 350, 62 L. ed. 337, 341, P.U.R. 1918A, 792, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 122. But there is no warrant in law for the contention that merely because its business fails to earn full 6 per cent upon the value of the property used, the company can escape either obligations voluntarily assumed or burdens imposed in the ordinary exercise of the police power. Compare Missouri P. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 279, 54 L. ed. 472, 479, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 330; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Arkansas, 219 U. S. 453, 55 L. ed. 290, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Omaha, 235 U. S. 121, 59 L. ed. 157, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 82.

Fourth: The company also insists that the ordinance is void because it denies equal protection of the laws. The contention rests upon the fact that since entry of the judgment below, the supreme court of the state has decided Superior v. Duluth Street R. Co. 166 Wis. 487, 165 N. W. 1081, which the company alleges is not reconcilable with [106] its decision in this case. The similarity of the ordinances and conditions in the two cases does not seem to us as clear as is asserted. But, however that may be, the 14th Amendment does not, in guaranteeing equal protection of the laws, assure uniformity of judicial decisions (Backus Jr. & Sons v. Fort Street Union Depot Co. 169 U. S. 557, 569, 42 L. ed. 853, 859, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 445), any more than, in guaranteeing due process, it assures immunity from judicial error (Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 40 L. ed. 91, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80; Tracey v. Ginzberg, 205 U. S. 170, 51 L. ed. 755, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461). Unlike Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 17 L. ed. 520, and Muhlker v. New York, 197 U. S. 544, 49 L. ed. 872, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522, where protection was afforded to rights acquired on the faith of decisions later overruled, the company seeks here to base rights on a later decision between strangers, which, it alleges, is irreconcilable on a matter of law with a decision theretofore rendered against it. The contention is clearly unsound.

As we conclude that there was a contractual duty to repave, arising from the acceptance of the franchise, we have no occasion to consider whether there was, as contended, also a statutory duty to do so, arising under § 1862, Wisconsin Statute, which provides that street railways shall "be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations . . . as the proper municipal authorities may by ordinance, from time to time, prescribe."

[107] FRANK P. McCLOSKEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
JOHN W. TOBIN, Sheriff of Bexar County, Texas.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 107, 108.)

Constitutional law — due process of law — equal protection of the laws — punishing barratry.

Rights under U. S. Const., 14th Amend., were not violated by a state statute which made it a criminal offense for any person by personal solicitation to seek employment to prosecute or collect claims, including unliquidated claims for personal injuries, although the state may have made causes of action in tort, as well as in contract, assignable.

[For other cases, see Constitutional Law, IV. a, 5, a; IV. b, 7, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Submitted November 12, 1919. Decided March 1, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Court of Criminal Appeals of the State of Texas to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the County Court of Bexar County, in that state, refusing a writ of habeas corpus to a person convicted of barratry. Affirmed.

See same case below, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 199 S. W. 1101.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. H. Ward submitted the cause for plaintiff in error:

The act in question is unconstitutional.

Mr. B. F. Looney, Attorney General of Texas, and Mr. Luther Nickels submitted the cause for defendant in error:

A statute enacted to promote health, safety, morals, or the public welfare may be valid, although it will compel discontinuance of existing businesses in whole or in part.

A closely analogous provision of a Michigan statute was upheld by this court in Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340, 343, 60 L. ed. 1034, 1036, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 561, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 522, and that provision of the Michigan statute related to an occupation recognized as highly useful.

Persons who indulge in barratry are described in Blackstone, vol. 4, p. 125, as "those pests of civil society that are perpetually endeavoring to disturb the repose of their neighbors and officiously interfering in other men's quarrels;" and barratry is elsewhere described as "the trafficking and merchandising in quarrels; the huckstering in litigious discord." Bouvier's Law Dict. Rawle's 3d ed. In Traer v. Clews, 115 U. S. 538, 539, 29 L. ed. 467, 470, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155, this court said: "The rule is that assignment of a mere right to file a bill in equity for fraud committed upon the assignor will be void, as contrary to public policy and savoring of maintenance:" if the mere assignment itself is against public policy, what can be said in favor of the personal solicitation thereof by the assignee?

The courts of the various states have generally disapproved of the practice of personal solicitation of employment in the collection of claims, etc., whether indulged in by attorneys or laymen.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court:

Article 421 of the Penal Code of Texas defined, with much detail, the offense of barratry. In McCloskey v. San Antonio Traction Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 192 S. W. 1116, a decree for an injunction restraining the plaintiff in error from pursuing the practice of fomenting and adjusting claims was reversed on the ground that this section had superseded the common-law offense of barratry, and that by the Code "only an attorney at law is forbidden to solicit employment in any suit himself or by an agent." Section 421 was then amended (Act of March 29, 1917, chap. 133) so as to apply to any person who "shall seek to obtain [108] employment in any claim, to prosecute, defend, present or collect the same by means of personal solicitation of such employment . . ." Thereafter McCloskey was arrested on an information which charged him with soliciting employment to collect two claims, one for personal injuries, the other for painting a buggy. He applied for a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied both by the county court and the court of criminal appeals. The case comes here under § 237 of the Judicial Code [36 Stat. at L. 1156, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. § 1214, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 723], McCloskey having claimed below, as here, that the act under which he was arrested violates rights guaranteed him by the 14th Amendment.

The contention is, that since the state had made causes of action in tort as well as in contract assignable (Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ginther, 96 Tex. 295, 72 S. W. 166), they had become an article of commerce; that the business of obtaining adjustment of claims is not inherently evil; and that, therefore, while regulation was permissible, prohibition of the business violates rights of liberty and property, and denies equal protection of the laws. The contention may be answered briefly. To prohibit solicitation is to regulate the business, not to prohibit it. Compare Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340, 60 L. ed. 1034, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 561, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 522. The evil against which the regulation is directed is one from which the English law has long sought to protect the community through proceedings for barratry and champerty. Co. Litt. p. 368 (Day's ed. 1812, vol. 2, § 701 [368, b.]); 1 Hawk. P. C. 6th ed. 524; Peck v. Heurich, 167 U. S. 624, 630, 42 L. ed. 302, 305, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 927. Regulation which aims to bring the conduct of the business into harmony with ethical practice of the legal profession, to which it is necessarily related, is obviously reasonable. Ford v. Munroe, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 349. The statute is not open to the objections urged against it.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

Action — misjoinder — employers' liability — concurrent negligence.

Rights conferred by Federal law are not denied by the refusal of a state court to permit the joinder in a single count which alleged concurring negligence of a cause of action against a railway company to recover damages under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and of a common-law action against the railway employee whose concurrent negligence was alleged to have contributed in producing the injury.

Joinder of parties or causes of action in suits under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

It was held in Ex parte Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 190 Ala. 132, 67 So. 256, that a plaintiff may join in distinct counts in one complaint a sufficiently stated cause of action arising out of the one transaction for breach of duty un-peal, affirmed a judgment of the City Court of Savannah, dismissing on demurrer a personal-injury action brought jointly against the railway company and an employee. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

See same case below, on first appeal, 21 Ga. App. 558, 94 S. E. 888; on second appeal, 22 Ga. App. 237, 95 S. E. 718.

Mr. Alexander A. Lawrence argued the cause, and, with Mr. William W. Osborne, filed a brief for petitioner.

Mr. H. W. Johnson argued the cause, and, with Mr. T. M. Cunningham, Jr., filed a brief for respondents.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court:

An injured employee brought an action in a state court of Georgia jointly against a railroad and its engineer, and sought in a single count, which alleged concurring negligence, to recover damages from the company under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and from the individual defendant under the common law. Each defendant filed a special demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action and misjoinder of parties defendant. The demurrers [110] were overruled by the trial court. The court of appeals—an intermediate appellate court to which the case went on exceptions—certified to the supreme court of the state the question whether such joinder was permissible. It answered in the negative (147 Ga. 428, — A.L.R. —, 94 S. E. 558). Thereupon the court of appeals reversed the judgment of the trial court (21 Ga. App. 558, 94 S. E. 888); and certiorari to the supreme court of the state was refused. The plaintiff then applied to this court for a writ of certiorari on the ground that he had been denied rights conferred by Federal law, and the writ was granted.

der the state Employers' Liability Act, and for breach of duty under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, but that he cannot recover under the state act in a case governed exclusively by the national statute.

A cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act may be joined with a cause of action under the state laws. Midland Valley R. Co. v. Ennis, 109 Ark. 206, 159 S. W. 214; Pelton v. Illinois C. R. Co. 171 Iowa, 91, 150 N. W. 236. This seems to have been the theory also of Wabash R. Co. v. Hayes, 234 U. S. 86, 58 L. ed. 1226, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, 6 N. C. C. A. 224, affirming 180 Ill. App. 511.

Counts at common law and under the Federal Employers' Liability Act may be joined in the same complaint in an action to recover for alleged negligent injury to a railway employee. Bouchard v. Central Vermont R. Co. 87 Vt. 399, L.R.A.1915C, 33, 89 Atl. 475.

But plaintiff was compelled to elect whether she would proceed under the state law or under the Federal law in South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Finan, 153 Ky. 340, 155 S. W. 742, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Strange, 156 Ky. 439, 161 S. W. 239. In the latter case the petition contained an allegation in the alternative that the carrier was engaged in interstate "or" intrastate commerce, but the plaintiff did not know which.

A similar decision appears in Thompson v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 165 Ky. 256, 176 S. W. 1006, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1266, where it was also held that plaintiff, having elected to proceed under the Federal act, could not join coemployees as defendants.

An employee of a railway company engaged in interstate commerce cannot maintain a joint action against the company and its engineer under the Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1908, where concurring negligence of the interstate carrier and its engineer in the course of interstate commerce is alleged as a cause of the injury to the plaintiff, and where also a violation of the Safety Appliance Act of Congress is charged against the carrier. Lee v. Central of Georgia R. Co. 147 Ga. 428, — A.L.R. —, 94 S. E. 558.

In determining the removability of a cause of action, the court in Kelly v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 201 Fed. 602, treats as an improper joinder a suit in which a cause of action against the corporate defendant under the Federal Employers' Liability Act was joined with one against an individual defendant under a state statute.

Recovery may be had in the same action both for the injuries sustained by the deceased and for his death, even where the action is brought by the representative of the deceased, for the benefit of all the beneficiaries. Northern P. R. Co. v. Maerkl, 117 C. C. A. 237, 198 Fed. 1.

lating solely to the form of the remedy. When they arise in state courts the final determination of such matters ordinarily rests with the state tribunals, even if the rights there being enforced are created by Federal law. John v. Paullin, 231 U. S. 583, 58 L. ed. 381, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 178; Nevada-California-Oregon R. Co. v. Burrus, 244 U. S. 103, 61 L. ed. 1019, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576. This has been specifically held in cases arising under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U. S. 211, 60 L. ed. 961, L.R.A.1917A, 86, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 595, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 505; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Mims, 242 U. S. 532, 61 L. ed. 476, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188, 17 N. C. C. A. 349; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Holloway, 246 U. S. 525, 62 L. ed. 867, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, 17 N. C. C. A. 578. It is only when matters nominally of procedure are actually matters of substance which affect a Federal right that the decision of the state court therein becomes subject to review by this court. Central Vermont R. Co. v. White, 238 U. S. 507, 59 L. ed. 1433, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 252, 9 N. C. C. A. 265; New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Harris, 247 U. S. 367, 62 L. ed. 1167, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act does not modify in any respect rights of employees against one another, existing at common law. To deny to a plaintiff the right to join in one count a cause against another employee with a cause of action against the employer in no way abridges any substantive right of the plaintiff against the [111] employer. The argument that plaintiff has been discriminated against because he is an interstate employee is answered, if answer be necessary, by the fact that the supreme court of Georgia had applied the same rule in Western & A. R. Co. v. Smith, 144 Ga. 737, 87 S. E. 1082 (22 Ga. App. 437, 96 S. E. 230), where it refused, under the State Employers' Liability Act, to permit the plaintiff to join with the employer another railroad whose concurrent negligence was alleged to have contributed in producing the injury complained of. If the supreme court of Georgia had in this case permitted the joinder, we might have been required to determine whether, in view of the practice prevailing in Georgia, such decision would not impair the employer's opportunity to make the defenses to which it is entitled by the Federal law. For, as stated by its supreme court in this case (147 Ga. 428, 431): "If the carrier and its engineer were jointly liable under the conditions stated in the second question, a joint judgment would result against them, and they would be equally bound, regardless of the fact that the duties imposed upon them are not the same. The jury would have no power in such a case to specify the particular damage to be recovered of each, since Civil Code, § 4512 [providing for verdicts in different amounts against the several defendants], is not applicable to personal torts."

But we have no occasion to consider this question. Refusal to permit the joinder did not deny any right of plaintiff conferred by Federal law. Cases upon which petitioner most strongly relies (Southern R. Co. v. Carson, 194 U. S. 136, 48 L. ed. 907, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Thompson, 200 U. S. 206, 50 L. ed. 441, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, 4 Ann. Cas. 1147; Southern R. Co. v. Miller, 217 U. S. 209, 54 L. ed. 732, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 450) are inapplicable to the situation at bar.

Affirmed.

[112] GRAND TRUNK WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 112-125.)

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — overpayment — deductions.

1. The Postmaster General, having satisfied himself that overpayments had been made to a railway company for carrying the mails, might, without establishing the illegality by suit, deduct the amount of such overpayments from the moneys otherwise payable to the railway company to which the overpayments had been made.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — overpayment — deductions — time.

2. The balances due to a railway company for carrying the mails, although arising under successive quadrennial contracts, are regarded as running accounts, and moneys paid in violation of law upon balances certified by the government accounting officers may be recovered by means of a later debit in these accounts. It does not matter how long a time elapsed before the overpayment was discovered, or how long the attempt to recover it was deferred.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — overpayment — executive construction of statute.

3. The long-continued practice of the Postoffice Department to pay the full mail transportation rates to a certain railroad company, instead of the 80 per cent payable if the construction of the railroad was land-aided, will not be given effect by the courts under the rule of long-continued executive construction, where such practice was not due to any construction of the statute which the Department later sought to abandon, but to what is alleged to be a mistake of fact,—due, perhaps, to an oversight.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c; Statutes, II. e, 2, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — land-aided railroad — reduced compensation — charge on railroad property.

4. The obligation of a land-aided railroad, under the Act of July 12, 1876, § 13, to carry the mails at 80 per cent of the rates otherwise payable, affects every carrier which may thereafter use the railroad, whatever the nature of the tenure, and it is immaterial that the railroad company which later carries the mail over such road received none of the land and obtained no benefit from the grant.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — what is land-aided railroad.

5. Railroad construction cannot be said not to have been land-aided, within the meaning of the Act of July 12, 1876, § 13, governing rates for mail transportation, because in fact it may have been completed without the aid either of funds or of credits derived from public lands, where, before the road had been fully completed, the railroad company asked that certain lands be granted to it in aid of construction, and accepted from the state a patent for the lands which recited that such was the purpose of the conveyance, and expressly assented to the terms and conditions of the grant which Congress imposed, and thereafter proceeded to dispose of the lands.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — land-aided railroad — purchaser on foreclosure.

6. The charge upon a railroad with reference to compensation for carrying the mails imposed by acceptance of a land grant with its terms and conditions may not be invalidated by any illegal act of the railroad under a mortgage foreclosure, although the mortgage was executed before the railroad company had applied for the grant, and it does not appear that the mortgage purported specifically to cover public lands, where the trustee under the mortgage classed these lands as after-acquired property, and the company's interest in them was, by special proceeding, made subject to the foreclosure proceedings.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — land-aided railroad — condition subsequent — forfeiture.

7. The requirement in a congressional grant of public lands to the state in aid of railroad construction that the railroad be completed within ten years was a condition subsequently annexed to an estate in fee, and the title remained valid until the Federal government should take action by legislation or judicial proceeding to enforce a forfeiture of the estate.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c; Public Lands, I. c, 2, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — land-aided railroad — extent of aid.

8. The burden of a land-aided railroad, under the Act of June 3, 1856, § 5, to carry the mails at a price to be fixed by Congress, attached upon the acceptance of any aid whatever, no matter how disproportionate to the cost of constructing the portion of the road so aided.

Postoffice — compensation for carrying mails — land-aided railroad — failure of consideration.

9. The right to have the mails carried at a price to be fixed by Congress, which was acquired by the Federal government by way of charge upon a railroad under the Act of June 3, 1856, through the railroad company's acceptance of a tract of public land therein granted to the state in aid of railroad construction, could not be invalidated by any illegal act of the authorities of the state in issuing a patent for a wholly different tract.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued January 21 and 22, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment which dismissed the petition of a railroad company to recover sums deducted by the Postoffice Department from its mail pay. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 473.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. D. Halpin argued the cause, and, with Messrs. P. G. Michener, L. T. Michener, and Harrison Geer, filed a brief for appellant:

The basis of the statute requiring land-grant railroads to transport mails at 80 per centum of the price allowed other railroads must be a valid contract.

S. 615, 35 L. ed. 1134, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306.

Neither Congress nor the state of Michigan attempted to, nor could they, force the lands on any person or corporation. The state of Michigan, as trustee, was acting as a proprietor in selling the lands. In that capacity it could and did treat with the purchasers precisely as any other proprietor might,—offering, agreeing upon, and accepting terms and entering into stipulations from which it would not be at liberty to depart, and to which it could not add in the smallest particular, except with the consent of the parties with whom it was dealing. The state as a sovereign could not deal with the lands otherwise than as it might between two private citizens.

Practical application of the facts and the statutes was, and is, binding on the Department and must be maintained here, it being especially objectionable that a construction of statutes which is favorable to the citizen should be changed in such a manner as to become retroactive, and to require of him the repayment of moneys to which he had supposed himself entitled, and upon the expectation of which he had made his contracts with the government, as in the case at bar.

If there be doubt simply as to the soundness of that practical construction, and that is the utmost that can be asserted here by the government, the action, during so many years, of the Department charged with the execution of the statute, should be respected by the court.

United States v. Finnell, 185 U. S. 236, 243, 244, 46 L. ed. 890, 893, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633; McMichael v. Murphy, 197 U. S. 304, 312, 49 L. ed. 766, 769, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 460.

If the statutes are ambiguous or of doubtful import, that practical construction of them was, and is, binding on the Department and must be maintained here, the courts looking with disfavor upon any sudden change such as in the case at bar, whereby parties who have contracted with the government upon faith of such construction may be prejudiced.

United States v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 142 U. S. 615, 621, 35 L. ed. 1134, 1136, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306, affirming 25 Ct. Cl. 30; Hawley v. Diller, 178 U. S. 476, 488, 44 L. ed. 1157, 1161, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 986; Houghton v. Payne, 194 U. S. 88, 99, 48 L. ed. 888, 891, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590.

The practice of an executive department through a series of years should not be overthrown unless such practice was obviously and clearly forbidden by the language of the statutes under which it proceeded.

Hawley v. Diller, supra; Hewitt v. Schultz, 180 U. S. 139, 156, 157, 45 L. ed. 463, 472, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 309; McMichael v. Murphy, 197 U. S. 304, 312, 49 L. ed. 766, 769, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 460; United States v. Midwest Oil Co. 236 U. S. 459, 59 L. ed. 673, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 309.

If that practical construction of the statutes by the Department could be held with reason to be wrong, it cannot be said, in view of the language used in them, to be so plainly or palpably wrong as to justify the Department, or the Comptroller, or a court, after the lapse of so many years, in holding or adjudging that the Department had misconstrued the statutes.

Assistant Attorney General Spellacy argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Leonard B. Zeisler and Charles H. Weston, filed a brief for appellee:

Appellant's road from Port Huron to Flint, Michigan, is land-aided.

Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. United States, 217 U. S. 180, 54 L. ed. 721, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470.

The government is not estopped by its previous treatment of the road as a non-land-grant road to now treat it as land aided.

United States v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 142 U. S. 615, 35 L. ed. 1134, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court:

The railroad from Port Huron to Flint, in Michigan, 60 miles in length, was completed on December 12, 1871. It was built by the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Railroad Company. By foreclosure of a mortgage executed [117] by that corporation and several consolidations it became on October 31, 1900, the property of the Grand Trunk Western Railway Company, and has since been a part of its system. For forty-one years after the completion of this 60-mile road the mails were carried over it by the successive owners under the usual postal contracts, and payment was made for the service quarterly at full rates. In 1912 the Postmaster General, concluding that this was a land-aided railroad within the provisions of § 13 of the Act of July 12, 1876, chap. 179, 19 Stat. at L. 78, 82 Comp. Stat. § 7485, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 199,[1] restated the account for the twelve full years during which the road had been operated by the Grand Trunk Western. Twenty per cent of the mail pay for that period was found to be $50,359,70; and this amount he deducted from sums accruing to the company under the current mail contract.

[1] "Sec. 13. That railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only eighty per centum of the compensation authorized by this act."

He also reduced by 20 per cent the amount otherwise payable under the current contract for carrying the mail over this part of its system. Thus he deducted altogether $52,566.87 from the amount payable on June 30, 1913. The road had in fact been built without any aid through grant of public lands. None had passed to the Grand Trunk Western when it acquired the road; and, so far as appears, that company had no actual knowledge that any of its predecessors in title had acquired any public land because of its construction. The company insisted that the $52,566.87 thus deducted from its mail pay was withheld without warrant in law, and brought this suit in the court of claims to recover the amount. 53 Ct. Cl. 473. Its petition was dismissed and the case comes here on appeal. Whether the company is entitled to relief depends upon the legal effect of the following facts:

[118] By Act of June 3, 1856, chap. 44, 11 Stat. at L. 21, Congress granted to Michigan public land to aid in the construction of certain lines of railroad, a part extending easterly of Flint to Port Huron; another part, westerly of Flint to Grand Haven. The act contained in § 5 the usual mail provision.[2] In 1857 the legislature of Michigan granted these lands to two companies on condition that they accept the obligations of the grant within sixty days. Each company filed within the specified time a partial acceptance, refusing to accede to the taxation features of the grant. Thereupon the rights of each to any part of the public lands was declared forfeited by the state authorities for failure to comply with the state legislation. Subsequently the companies filed maps of definite location in the General Land Office of the Interior Department, which were approved by that office; and on June 3, 1863, the Secretary of the Interior certified to the governor of Michigan 30,998.76 acres of land lying west of Flint for the company which was to build the line from Grand Haven to Flint,—the Detroit & Milwaukee Railway Company. On November 1, 1864, he certified 6,428.68 acres, all but 97 49/100 acres of which lay east of Flint, for the company which was to build the line from Flint to Port Huron,—the Port Huron & Milwaukee Railway Company. Neither company constructed its line nor received any patent for land. The rights of way and other property of the Port Huron & Milwaukee Railway Company passed through a foreclosure sale to the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Railroad Company; and this corporation built the road in question during the years 1869, 1870, and 1871. [119] But it made no application for any part of these lands until three weeks before the completion of the road. Then, on November 18, 1871, it petitioned the state board of control, which was charged with the disposition of the public lands, to confer upon it both the 30,998.76 acres west of Flint and the 6,428.68 acres east of Flint, which the Secretary of the Interior had certified; and in so applying it asked for the land "for the purpose of aiding in the construction" of its contemplated railroad, which was described as extending from Grand Haven to Flint and thence to Port Huron. The board approved of making the grant "for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the road;" but no further action was taken until May 1, 1873, when, upon a new petition of the company which recited the former proceedings and the completion of "60 miles of the unfinished portion of said line," the board directed the transfer of all the land to it. The resolution of the board was followed on May 30, 1873, by a patent for all the land from the governor of the state, its formal acceptance by the company, subject to the provisions of the Act of Congress of June 3, 1856, and action by it to take possession of the land and to dispose of it for the benefit of the company. In 1877 the supreme court of Michigan held, in Bowes v. Haywood, 35 Mich. 241, that the patent, so far as it purported to transfer the 30,988.76 acres west of Flint, was void under the Michigan legislation, because there had not, in fact, been any claim or pretense that the company ever contemplated building the line west of Flint; and in Fenn v. Kinsey, 45 Mich. 446, 8 N. W..64 (1881), that court held that an act of the Michigan legislature passed May 14, 1877, which purported to ratify the patent, was inoperative so far as it concerned the lands west of Flint, because it impaired rights reserved to the United States by the Act of June 3, 1856. Meanwhile, Congress had relinquished to Michigan, by Joint Resolution of March 3, 1879, No. 15, 20 Stat. at L. 490, its reversionary [120] interest in

[2] "Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported over said roads, under the direction of the Postoffice Department, at such price as Congress may, by law, direct; Provided, That until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General shall have the power to determine the same."

the lands;[3] and thereafter the legislature of Michigan (Act of June 9, 1881, Mich. Laws, 1881, p. 362) ratified as to the 6,000 acres east of Flint, the action theretofore taken by the state authorities, declaring also that "all deeds and conveyances heretofore executed by the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Railroad Company" "shall be deemed of full force and effect," and that "the rest and residue of said lands is vested in said company, its successors and assigns." Whether there remained then any land which had not been disposed by that company or one of its successors does not appear; but it does appear that when, in 1875, proceedings were taken to foreclose the mortgage under which the appellant claims title to the road, the trustee to whom the lands had been transferred for the company's benefit was joined for the purpose of including all such interest in the property to be sold.

The Act of June 3, 1856, had contemplated a grant of six sections (3,840 acres) per mile of road to be constructed. That would have been 230,400 acres for the 60 miles. The company which built them and those claiming under it received at most 6,428 acres. The case is one of apparent hardship. Was the judgment of the court of claims denying relief required by the applicable rules of law?

First: If the railroad was land-aided, payment of more than 80 per cent of the full rates otherwise provided by law was unauthorized; and it was the duty of the Postmaster General to seek to recover the overpayment. Revised [121] Statutes, § 4057, Comp. Stat. § 7606, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 252. He was under no obligation to establish the illegality by suit. Having satisfied himself of the fact, he was at liberty to deduct the amount of the overpayment from the moneys otherwise payable to the company to which the overpayment had been made. Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. United States, 164 U. S. 190, 41 L. ed. 399, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 45. There was no attempt to include in the deduction any alleged overpayment to any of appellant's predecessors in title. Balances due for carrying the mails, although arising under successive quadrennial contracts, are regarded as running accounts, and moneys paid in violation of law upon balances certified by the accounting officers may be recovered by means of a later debit in these accounts. It matters not how long a time elapsed before the error in making the overpayment was discovered, or how long the attempt to recover it was deferred. The Statute of Limitations does not ordinarily run against the United States, and would not present a bar to a suit for the amount. See United States v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 486, 25 L. ed. 194. It is true that when a department charged with the execution of a statute gives it a construction, and acts upon that construction uniformly for a series of years, the court will look with disfavor upon a change whereby parties who have contracted with the government upon the faith of that construction would be injured. United States v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 142 U. S. 615, 35 L. ed. 1134, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306. But here the practice, long continued, of paying the full rate, instead of 80 per cent thereof, was not due to any construction of a statute which the Department later sought to abandon, but to what is alleged to be a mistake of fact,—due, perhaps, to an oversight. To such a case the rule of long-continued construction has no application. The appellant must be held to have taken the road with notice of the burdens legally imposed upon it.

Second: If the road was land-aided, it is immaterial that the company which later carried the mail over it received [122] none of the land and obtained no benefit from the grant. The obligation to carry mails at 80 per cent of rates otherwise payable attached to the road like an easement or charge; and it affects every carrier who may thereafter use the railroad, whatever the nature of the tenure. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. United States, 217 U. S. 180, 54 L. ed. 721, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470. The appellant expressly disclaims any contention that the mail clause should not apply because the quantity of land covered by the grant was small as compared with that contemplated by the Act of June 3, 1856, and with the cost of the road.

Third: It is contended that this railroad was not land-aided, because it had, in fact, been completed without the aid either of funds or of credit derived from these public lands. Whether the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Company, which built the railroad, was in fact aided by the land grant in so doing, is immaterial. Before the road had been fully completed it asked that the land be granted to it in aid of the construction, and for this purpose only could the grant be made under the act of Congress. It accepted from the state a patent for the land which recited that such was the purpose of the conveyance; and it expressly assented to the terms and conditions of the grant imposed by the Act of June 3, 1856. Thereafter it proceeded to dispose of the land. Throughout this period the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Company remained the owner of the railroad. It had been authorized by its charter to receive the land grant and necessarily to assent to the conditions upon which alone the grant could be made to it. It is true that the mortgage upon its property, under which appellant claims title, was executed before the company had applied for the grant; and it does not appear that the mortgage purported specifically to cover public lands; but the trustee under the mortgage claimed these lands as after-acquired property, and the company's interest in them was, by special proceeding, made subject [123] to the foreclosure proceedings. The appellant is therefore in no better position than the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Company to question the charge upon the railroad imposed by acceptance of the grant.

[3] Resolution of March 3, 1879: "That the United States hereby releases to the state of Michigan any and all reversionary interest which may remain in the United States in such of the lands granted to, and acquired by the said state of Michigan by act of Congress of June third, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, and certified to the said state in accordance with the said act, as were granted to aid the construction of the road from Grand Haven to Flint, and then to Port Huron. This release shall not in any manner affect any legal or equitable rights in said lands, which have been acquired, but all such rights shall be and remain unimpaired."

Fourth: Appellant points to the fact that the patent to the lands lying west of Flint was later held to be void by the supreme court of the state; and insists that thereby the charge or condition concerning the carriage of the mail must be held to have been relinquished. But the patent to the lands east of Flint never was declared void; the company's title to them never was questioned; and the objection to the patent to the western lands did not apply to them. That objection was that the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Railway Company was not a "competent party" to receive the western lands, within the meaning of the 11th section of the Michigan Act of 1857, because it did not propose to construct a line from Grand Haven to Owosso. Bowes v. Haywood, 35 Mich. 246. And the attempt by the legislature to make it a "competent party" through the Act of 1877 violated the obligations of the Federal government's grant. Fenn v. Kensey, 45 Mich. 446, 8 N. W. 64. The only flaw in the title to the lands east of Flint lay in the fact that the railway had not been completed within ten years of the Act of June 3, 1856, as required by that act. This requirement, however, was a condition subsequently annexed to an estate in fee, and the title remained valid until the Federal government should take action by legislation or judicial proceedings to enforce a forfeiture of the estate. Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44, 63, 64, 22 L. ed. 551, 555, 556; Iowa R. Land Co. v. Courtright (Cedar Rapids & M. River R. Co. v. Courtright) 21 Wall. 310, 316, 22 L. ed. 582, 583. So far from doing so Congress relinquished by joint resolution its reversionary interest in the land, and thereby removed all possibility of objection on its part to the validity of the patent; and the state of Michigan later ratified the patent by legislation admitted to be valid.

Fifth: The appellant urges that the illegality of the patent [124] to the western lands constituted a failure of consideration which voided the contract with the government. The burden of the mail clause, it says, could be imposed only by contract between the government and Port Huron & Lake Michigan Company. The contract was for land west as well as east of Flint; and the land west could legally be granted only if the company contemplated building the road westward to Grand Haven. As there was not even a pretense that it contemplated such construction, the contract was illegal. The government's claim under the mail clause must fail, because no rights can be acquired under an illegal contract. So the appellant contends. Such a view is the result of regarding the transaction as a promise by the railway to the government to carry the mail at a price fixed by Congress, on consideration of 36,000 acres of public land. A contract of this sort would create a purely personal obligation attaching "to the company, and not to the property,"—clearly not to a mere licensee. However, it is settled that the obligation in question is not of this nature, but does attach to the property, even when used by a licensee. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. United States, 217 U. S. 180, 54 L. ed. 721, 30

Sup. Ct. Rep. 470. The obligation of a land-aided railway to carry the mail at a price fixed by Congress is a charge upon the property. The public lands were granted to Michigan to aid the construction of certain railways upon certain conditions. The legislature of Michigan could not dispose of the lands except in accordance with the terms of the grant. By the Act of February 14, 1857, it accepted the grant and enacted legislation to give legal effect to the conditions of it. Section 4 of the act is as follows:

"Said railroads shall be and forever remain public highways for the use of the government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States; and the United States mail shall be transported over said railroads, [125] under the direction of the Postoffice Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct. . . ."

The order of the board of control of May 1, 1873, directing the transfer of the land to the Port Huron & Lake Michigan Company, and the patent issued by the governor, were founded upon the authority of § 11 of this act; and under date of May 30, 1873, the company accepted the lands with the burdens they imposed. The railroad, whose owners and constructors accepted aid derived from these lands, became charged by operation of law with the burden of transporting the mails. The question whether that company would have accepted the land with its burdens if it had foreseen the invalidity of the title to the western lands is wholly immaterial. The burden attached upon the acceptance of any aid whatsoever, no matter how disproportionate to the cost of constructing the portion so aided.

The transaction called illegal was one between the company and the state authorities. The United States was no party to it. It had merely supplied property which the parties to it used. The government never objected to the disposition made of it; and evidenced its approval by passage of the Joint Resolution of March 3, 1879. No reason exists why rights by way of charge upon the railroad which were acquired by the government through the acceptance of 6,000 acres of public land should be invalidated by the alleged illegality of the state authorities' action in issuing a patent to a wholly different tract.

Affirmed.

[126] MATHEW T. CHAPMAN and Mark C. Chapman, Petitioners,
v.
JOHN A. WINTROATH.

Patents — interference — limitation.

An inventor whose parent application discloses, but does not claim, an invention which conflicts with that of a later unexpired patent, must, in the absence of laches, be deemed to have two years from the date of the conflicting patent in which to file a second application, making conflicting claims, in order to have the question of priority of invention between the two determined in an interference proceeding, in view of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4886, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1897, which gives an inventor two years after patent has issued to another for his invention, in which he may file his own application, and the time cannot be cut down to one year on grounds of equity or public policy, or because of the one-year rule prescribed by § 4894, for further prosecution of an application after office action thereon.

Argued January 9, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

ON WRIT of Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, to review a decree which reversed a decision of the Commissioner of Patents in an interference case. Reversed.

See same case below, 47 App. D. C. 428.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John L. Jackson argued the cause, and, with Mr. Albert H. Adams, filed a brief for petitioners:

An application for patent is a purely statutory proceeding, and an applicant is entitled to all the rights conferred by the patent statutes.

United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 167 U. S. 224, 246, 42 L. ed. 144, 156, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809.

Considering Chapman and Chapman's original application merely as proof of their priority over Wintroath, they are indubitably the first inventors of the issue of the interference.

Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. American Graphophone Co. 76 C. C. A. 180, 145 Fed. 351; Automatic Weighing Mach. Co. v. Pneumatic Scale Corp. 92 C. C. A. 206, 166 Fed. 288; Sundh Electric Co. v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 117 C. C. A. 280, 198 Fed. 94; Lemley v. Dobson-Evans Co. 156 C. C. A. 171, 243 Fed. 391.

Interferences are authorized for the sole purpose of determining the question of priority of invention.

United States ex rel. Lowry v. Allen, 203 U. S. 476, 51 L. ed. 281, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141; Ewing v. United States, 244 U. S. 1, 11, 61 L. ed. 955, 959, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494.

It follows that, inasmuch as Chapman and Chapman's applications (divisional as well as original) were filed less than two years after the grant of Wintroath's patent, and their priority over Wintroath is incontrovertibly established, judgment should have been rendered in their favor. .

Ewing v. United States, supra.

Until the amendment of March 3, 1897, to U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4886, Comp. Stat. § 9430, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 23, which introduced the words "or more than two years prior to his application," a prior unexpired patent was never a bar to the grant of a patent to an applicant who could prove his claim to priority over it, regardless of when his application was filed.

Shreeve v. Grissinger, 202 Off. Gaz. 951; C. D. 1914, 49 (p. 51).

Section 4904 of U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. § 9449, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 193, provides for the declaration of interferences between an application and any unexpired patent, so that, reading the latter section in connection with § 4886, when the Commission is of the opinion that an interference exists between an application and any unexpired patent issued not more than two years before the application was filed, the applicant has a statutory right to the declaration of such interference, and, on proving priority, to receive his patent.

Ewing v. United States, supra.

An applicant who prosecutes his application according to law and the Patent Office rules is not chargeable with laches.

United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 167 U. S. 224, 246, 42 L. ed. 144, 156, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809; Crown Cork & Seal Co. v. Aluminum Stopper Co. 48 C. C. A. 72, 108 Fed. 845; Columbia Motor Car Co. v. C. A. Duerr & Co. 107 C. C. A. 215, 184 Fed. 895.

The time when a claim is first made is immaterial, as when made it relates back to the date of the filing of the application; and if made in a divisional application, it relates back to the date of the filing of the original or parent application.

Lotz v. Kenney, 31 App. D. C. 205; Von Recklinghausen v. Dempster, 34 App. D. C. 474.

The patent laws do not recognize such a thing as the constructive abandonment of an invention for which an applicant had lawfully filed, and is regularly prosecuting, an application for patent. Abandonment of an invention is a question of fact, and must be proven.

Ide v. Trorlicht, D. & R. Carpet Co. 53 C. C. A. 341, 115 Fed. 144; Saunders v. Miller, 33 App. D. C. 456; Miller v. Eagle Mfg. Co. 151 U. S. 186, 38 L. ed. 121, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 310; Rolfe v. Hoffman, 26 App. D. C. 340; Kinnear Mfg. Co. v. Wilson, 74 C. C. A. 232, 142 Fed. 973.

Abandonment of an invention is a very different thing from abandonment of an application for patent.

Western Electric Co. v. Sperry Electric Co. 7 C. C. A. 164, 18 U. S. App. 177, 58 Fed. 191; Hayes-Young Tie Plate Co. v. St. Louis Transit Co. 70 C. C. A. 1, 137 Fed. 82; General Electric Co. v. Continental Fibre Co. 168 C. C. A. 54, 256 Fed. 660.

Abandonment of an invention completed and reduced to practice by the filing of an allowable application for patent therefor inures to the benefit of the public, and not to the benefit of a later inventor.

Ex parte Grosselin, 97 Off. Gaz. 2979; Re Millett, 18 App. D. C. 186, 96 Off. Gaz. 1241.

The rule as to constructive abandonment in the case of applications for reissue, generally, though not invariably, fixes a limit of two years.

It was not Chapman and Chapman's duty, but the commissioner's, to ascertain if there was an interference, and to declare it.

Ewing v. United States, 244 U. S. 1, 11, 61 L. ed. 955, 959, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. 26, 28, 585, 594–597.

The apparent disapproval of the court of appeals of the existing statutory provisions governing the filing and prosecution of applications for patent does not justify legislation by that court to correct what it conceives to be unwise, or against public policy. Congress is the only body endowed under the Constitution with legislative power.

Boston Store v. American Graphophone Co. 246 U. S. 8, 62 L. ed. 551, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 447.

The question of actual priority of invention having been foreclosed by Wintroath's admission, the court of appeals was without jurisdiction on an interference appeal to hear and determine Chapman and Chapman's right to a patent.

Norling v. Hayes, 37 App. D. C. 169; United States ex rel. Lowry v. Allen, 203 U. S. 476, 51 L. ed. 281, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141.

Mr. Melville Church filed a brief as amicus curiæ.

Messrs. John C. Pennie, Dean S. Edmonds, Charles J. O'Neill, and Helge Murray also filed a brief as amici curiæ.

Mr. Paul Synnestvedt argued the cause, and, with Mr. H. L. Lechner, filed a brief for respondent:

While the patenting of an invention is purely statutory, the statute has been uniformly construed in the light of the underlying purpose of the patent system,—the promotion of the progress of science and the useful arts.

Kendall v. Winsor, 21 How. 322–328, 16 L. ed. 165–167.

Diligence is axiomatic; and there is a time limit within which claims to a particular invention shown, but not claimed in an application, may be added.

Ex parte Dyson, 232 Off. Gaz. 901; Re Fritts, 45 App. D. C. 211; Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Thomas A. Edison, 144 C. C. A. 281, 229 Fed. 999; Christensen v. Noyes, 15 App. D. C. 94; Bechman v. Wood, 15 App. D. C. 484; Skinner v. Carpenter, 36 App. D. C. 178.

The statute itself lays down a pre-application rule of diligence and a post-application rule.

Where an applicant has an application showing, inter alia, but not at any time claiming, a particular feature pending in the Patent Office for years, he should proceed at least within one year after the issuance of a rival patent for the same invention, to copy claims therefrom for the purpose of an interference, by analogy with U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4894, Comp. Stat. § 9438, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 181.

The issue of a patent is constructive notice to the public of its contents.

Boyden v. Burke, 14 How. 575–583, 14 L. ed. 548–551.

If Chapman and Chapman's divisional application be considered independently of the present application, they are out of court in their own admission of a prior public use of more than two years. If considered as a continuation of the parent application, post-application rules of diligence apply and they are guilty of lack of diligence.

Chapman and Chapman were never prosecuting an application for the invention, and there is no basis in the statute or authority for the proposition that the mere presence of a drawing or description of a feature in an application constitutes a reduction to practice thereof such as will defeat a later inventor, but earlier patentee.

Pittsburgh Water Heater Co. v. Beler Water Heater Co. 143 C. C. A. 196, 228 Fed. 683; Saunders v. Miller, 33 App. D. C. 456.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1909 Mathew T. Chapman and Mark C. Chapman filed an application for a patent on an "improvement in deep well pumps." The mechanism involved was complicated, the specification intricate and long, and the claims numbered thirty-four. The application met with unusual difficulties in the Patent Office, and, although it had been regularly prosecuted, as required by law and the rules of the Office, it was still pending without having been passed to patent in 1915, when the controversy in this case arose.

In 1912 John A. Wintroath filed an application for a patent on "new and useful improvements in well mechanism," which was also elaborate and intricate, with twelve combination claims, but a patent was issued upon it on November 25, 1913.

Almost twenty months later, on June 6, 1915, the Chapmans filed a divisional application in which the claims of the Wintroath patent were copied, and on this application such proceedings were had in the Patent Office that on March 24, 1916, an interference was declared between it and the Wintroath patent.

The interference proceeding related to the combination of a fluid-operated bearing supporting a downward extending shaft, and auxiliary bearing means for sustaining any resultant downward or upward thrust of such shaft. It is sufficiently described in count three of the Notice of Interference:

[133] "3. In deep well pumping mechanism, the combination with pump means including a pump casing located beneath the surface of the earth and rotary impeller means in said casing, of a downwardly extending power shaft driven from above and adapted to drive said impeller means, a fluid-operated bearing co-operating to support said shaft, said fluid-operated bearing being located substantially at the top of said shaft so that the shaft depends from the fluid bearing and by its own weight tends to draw itself into a substantially straight vertical line, means for supplying fluid under pressure to said fluid bearing independently of the action of the pump means, auxiliary bearing means for sustaining any resultant downward thrust of said power shaft and auxiliary bearing means for sustaining any resultant upward thrust of said power shaft."

Wintroath admits that the invention thus in issue was clearly disclosed in the parent application of the Chapmans, but he contends that their divisional application, claiming the discovery, should be denied, because of their delay of nearly twenty months in filing, after the publication of his patent, and the Chapmans, while asserting that their parent application fully disclosed the invention involved, admit that the combination of the Wintroath patent was not specifically claimed in it.

Pursuant to notice and the rules of the Patent Office, Wintroath, on April 27, 1916, filed a statement, declaring that he conceived the invention contained in the claims of his patent "on or about the 1st of October, 1910," and thereupon, because this date was subsequent to the Chapman filing date, March 10, 1909, the Examiner of Interferences notified him that judgment on the record would be entered against him unless he showed cause within thirty days why such action should not be taken.

Within the rule day Wintroath filed a motion for judgment in his favor "on the record," claiming that conduct on the part of the Chapmans was shown, which estopped [134] them from making the claims involved in the interference, and which amounted to an abandonment of any rights in respect thereto which they may once have had. The Chapmans contended that such a motion for judgment could not properly be allowed "until an opportunity had been granted for the introduction of evidence." But the Examiner of Interferences, without hearing evidence, entered judgment on the record in favor of Wintroath, and awarded priority to him, on the ground that the failure of the Chapmans to make claims corresponding to the interference issue for more than one year after the date of the patent to Wintroath constituted equitable laches which estopped them from successfully making such claims. This holding, based on the earlier decision by the court of appeals in Rowntree v. Sloan, 45 App. D. C. 207, was affirmed by the Examiner in Chief, but was reversed by the Commissioner of Patents, whose decision, in turn, was reversed by the court of appeals in the judgment which we are reviewing.

In its decision the court of appeals holds that an inventor whose parent application discloses, but does not claim, an invention which conflicts with that of a later unexpired patent, may file a second application, making conflicting claims, in order to have the question of priority of invention between the two determined in an interference proceeding, but only within one year from the date of the patent, and that longer delay in filing constitutes equitable laches, which bars the later application. By this holding the court substitutes a one-year rule for a two-year rule which had prevailed in the Patent Office for many years before the Rowntree decision, rendered in 1916, and the principal reason given for this important change is that the second application should be regarded as substantially an amendment to the parent application, and that it would be inequitable to permit a longer time for filing it than the one year allowed by Rev. Stat. § 4894, Comp. Stat. § 9438, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 181, [135] for further prosecution of an application after office action thereon.

The question presented for decision is, whether this conclusion is justifiable and sound; and the answer must be found in the statutes and rules of the Patent Office, made pursuant to statute, prescribing the action necessary to be taken in order to obtain a patent,—for the whole subject is one of statutory origin and regulation.

The statute which is fundamental to all others in our patent law (Rev. Stat. § 4886, as amended March 3, 1897, 29 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 391, Comp. Stat. § 9430, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 23) provides with respect to the effect of a United States patent upon the filing of a subsequent application for a patent on the same discovery, which is all we are concerned with here, that any discoverer of a patentable invention, not known or used by others in this country before his invention or discovery, may file an application for a patent upon it, at any time within two years after it may have been patented in this country. Such a prior patent is in no sense a bar to the granting of a second patent for the same invention to an earlier inventor, provided that his application is filed not more than two years after the date of the conflicting patent. The applicant may not be able to prove that he was the first inventor, but the statute gives him two years in which to claim that he was, and in which to secure the institution of an interference proceeding in which the issue of priority between himself and the patentee may be determined in a prescribed manner.

This section, unless it has been modified by other statutes, or, in effect, by decisions of the courts, is plainly not reconcilable with the decision of the court of appeals, and should rule it. Has it been so modified?

The section of the Revised Statutes dealing with inventions previously patented in a foreign country (Rev. Stat. § 4887, as amended March 3, 1903, 32 Stat. at L. 1225, chap. 1019, Comp. Stat. § 9431, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 138) provides that no patent shall be granted on an [136] application for a patent if the invention has been patented in this or any foreign country more than two years before the date of the actual filing of the application in this country.

Section 4897 of the Revised Statutes (Act of July 8, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 202, chap. 230, § 35, Comp. Stat. § 9443, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 188), in dealing with the renewal of an application in case of failure to pay the final fee within six months of notice that a patent has been allowed, provides that another application may be made for the invention "the same as in the case of an original application." But such application must be made within two years after the allowance of the original application.

And in Rev. Stat. § 4920, Comp. Stat. § 9466, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. 309, providing for pleadings and proofs in infringement suits, it is provided that when properly pleaded and noticed the defendant may prove in defense that the patent declared on had been patented prior to the plaintiff's supposed invention, "or more than two years prior to his application for a patent therefor," and also that the subject-matter of the patent "had been in public use or on sale in this country for more than two years" before the plaintiff's application for a patent.

Thus through all of these statutes runs the time limit of two years for the filing of an application, there is no modification in any of them of the like provision in Rev. Stat. § 4886, as amended, and no distinction is made between an original and a later or a divisional application, with respect to this filing right.

A brief reference to the decisions will show that, until the Rowntree Case, the courts had left the filing right under Rev. Stat. § 4886, as untouched as the statutes thus had left it.

There is no suggestion in the record that the original application of the Chapmans was not prosecuted strictly as required by the statutes and the rules of the Patent Office, and therefore, it is settled, their rights may not be denied or diminished on the ground that such delay may [137] have been prejudicial to either public or private interests. "A party seeking a right under the patent statutes may avail himself of all their provisions, and the courts may not deny him the benefit of a single one. These are questions not of natural but of purely statutory right. Congress, instead of fixing seventeen, had the power to fix thirty years as the life of a patent. No court can disregard any statutory provisions in respect to these matters on the ground that, in its judgment, they were unwise or prejudicial to the interests of the public." United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 167 U. S. 224, 246, 42 L. ed. 144, 155, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809.

In reissue cases, where there was no statutory time prescribed for the making of an application for the correction of a patent, and although unusual diligence is required in such cases, this court adopted the two-year rule as reasonable by analogy to the law of public use before an application for a patent. Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354, 363, 28 L. ed. 665, 668, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 451; Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 96, 101, 29 L. ed. 350, 351, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1137.

To this we must add that not only have later or divisional applications not been dealt with in a hostile spirit by the courts, but, on the contrary, designed as they are to secure the patent to the first discoverer, they have been favored to the extent that where an invention clearly disclosed in an application, as in this case, is not claimed therein, but is subsequently claimed in another application, the original will be deemed a constructive reduction of the invention to practice, and the later one will be given the filing date of the earlier, with all of its priority of right. Smith & G. Mfg. Co. v. Sprague, 123 U. S. 249, 250, 31 L. ed. 141, 142, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 122;

Von Recklinghausen v. Dempster, 34 App. D. C. 474, 476, 477.

These, a few from many, suffice to show that, prior to the Rowntree Case, the decisions did not tend to modification of the statutory two-year rule.

The court of appeals recognizes all this law as applicable to an original application, but it finds warrant for [138] cutting the time limit to one year in the case of later applications in three reasons, viz.: Because it is inequitable to allow so long a time as two years for filing a new application, claiming a discovery for which a patent has issued; because such a time allowance is contrary to public policy, as unduly extending the patent monopoly if the new application should prevail; and, finally and chiefly, as we have pointed out, because, regarding such a later application as substantially an amendment to the original application, the court discovers, in analogy to the time allowed by statute for amendment to applications (Rev. Stat. § 4894, Comp. Stat. § 9438, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 181), a reason for holding that the failure for more than one year to make a later, in this case a divisional, application, amounts to fatal laches.

However meritorious the first two of these grounds may seem to be, they cannot prevail against the provisions of the statutes (United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. supra), and the third does not seem to us persuasive because of the difference in the kind of notice which is given to the applicant under Rev. Stat. § 4894 and that given him when a patent is issued conflicting with his application.

The one-year provision of Rev. Stat. § 4894, as amended March 3, 1897 (29 Stat. at L. 693, chap. 391, Comp. Stat. § 9438, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 181), is that an applicant for a patent, who shall fail to prosecute his application within one year after Patent Office action thereon, "of which notice shall have been given" him, shall be regarded as having abandoned his application, unless the Commissioner of Patents shall be satisfied that such delay was unavoidable. But when a conflict between inventions disclosed in applications escapes the attention of the Patent Office Examiners (Rev. Stat. § 4904, Comp. Stat. § 9449, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 193), and a patent is issued, with claims conflicting with the disclosures of a pending application, the applicant receives only such notice of the conflict as he is presumed to derive from the publication of the patent. In the one case the notice [139] is actual and specific; in the other it is indefinite and constructive only. When the great number of patents constantly being issued is considered, many of them of a voluminous and complicated character, such as we have in this case, with many and variously worded claims, such an implied notice must necessarily be precarious and indefinite to a degree which may well have been thought to be a sufficient justification for allowing the longer two-year period to inventors who must, at their peril, derive from such notice their knowledge of any conflict with their applications.

As has been pointed out, the Examiner of Interferences did not permit the introduction of any evidence with respect to laches or abandonment, and the court of appeals rests its judgment, as he did, wholly upon the delay of the Chapmans in filing their divisional application for more than one year after the Wintroath patent was issued, as this appeared "on the face of the record." While not intending to intimate that there may not be abandonment which might bar an application within the two-year period allowed for filing, yet upon this discussion of the statutes and decisions, we cannot doubt that upon the case disclosed in this record, the Chapmans were within their legal rights in filing their divisional application at any time within two years after the publication of the Wintroath patent, and therefore the judgment of the Court of Appeals must be reversed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds dissents.

[140] NATIONAL LEAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 140-147.)

Duties — drawback — following departmental construction.

1. The Federal Supreme Court will follow the long-standing ruling of the Treasury Department under which the drawback provided for by the Act of August 27, 1894, § 22, upon the exportation of articles manufactured from imported dutiable materials, to be "equal in amount to the duties paid on the materials used," less 1 per cent, is computed, where linseed oil and oil cake have both been manufactured from imported linseed paying a specific duty and the oil cake has been exported, upon the basis of the value of the two products, and not in proportion to their respective weights.

[For other cases, see Duties, X. c; Statutes, II. e, 2, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Statutes — re-enactment — executive construction.

2. Repeated re-enactment of a statute without substantial change amounts to an implied legislative recognition and approval of an established executive construction of the statute.

[For other cases, see Statutes, IV. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Evidence — presumption — legislative act.

3. Congress is presumed to have legislated with knowledge of an established usage of an executive department of the government.

[For other cases, see Evidence, II. 1, 1, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Argued January 12 and 13, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment which dismissed a suit to recover the difference between the amount of a drawback allowed by the Federal government and the amount claimed. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 635.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander Britton argued the cause, and, with Messrs. Evans Browne and F. W. Clements, filed a brief for appellant:

The construction of the act by the Treasury Department cannot change its intent and purpose so far as the method of computation of the drawback is concerned.

Campbell v. United States, 107 U. S. 407, 27 L. ed. 592, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 759; Dean Linseed Oil Co. v. United States, 78 Fed. 468, 31 C. C. A. 51, 57 U. S. App. 716, 87 Fed. 457; St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. Phelps, 137 U. S. 528, 536, 34 L. ed. 767, 769, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; Morrill v. Jones, 106 U. S. 466, 467, 27 L. ed. 267, 268, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 423.

Where the language of a statute is free from ambiguity, the statute must be literally enforced.

United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, 387, 2 L. ed. 314, 315; Denn ex dem. Scott v. Reid, 10 Pet. 524, 527, 9 L. ed. 519, 520; Lewis v. United States, 92 U. S. 618, 621, 23 L. ed. 513, 514; Thornley v. United States, 113 U. S. 310, 313, 28 L. ed. 999, 1000, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491; Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. Where the language of a statute is clear, executive construction in violation of its terms is entitled to no weight.

United States v. Temple, 105 U. S. 97, 99, 26 L. ed. 967, 968; Swift & C. & B. Co. v. United States, 105 U. S. 691, 695, 26 L. ed. 1108, 1109; United States v. Graham, 110 U. S. 219, 221, 20 L. ed. 126, 127, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582; St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. Phelps, 137 U. S. 528, 536, 34 L. ed. 767, 769, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; United States v. Alger, 152 U. S. 384, 397, 38 L. ed. 488, 489, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635.

The policy underlying a statute is an uncertain guide of construction.

Hadden v. The Collector (Hadden v. Barney) 5 Wall. 107, 111, 112, 18 L. ed. 518–520; Dewey v. United States, 178 U. S. 510, 521, 44 L. ed. 1170, 1174, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 981.

It may be conceded that the primary purpose of that act was, in general, to raise revenue; but this concession does not involve an admission that every section of the act is to be construed to effectuate that purpose. With regard to imports comprehended within the drawback clause, it was certainly not the primary purpose to raise revenue by taxing them upon importation.

Campbell v. United States, 107 U. S. 407, 413, 27 L. ed. 592, 595, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 759.

Assistant Attorney General Davis argued the cause, and, with Mr. Charles F. Jones, filed a brief for appellee:

Where there is doubt as to the meaning of the law, the contemporaneous construction of those charged with its execution is conclusive.

Pugh, 99 U. S. 265–269, 25 L. ed. 322, 323.

We have a right to presume that when Congress passed the Act of 1894, it did so with the full knowledge of the construction placed upon the same provisions in other acts by the Treasury Department, and with the intention that the language employed should be construed in the same manner and with the same meaning as the provisions before mentioned had been construed.

United States v. Bailey, 9 Pet. 238, 9 L. ed. 113; United States v. Falk, 204 U. S. 143, 51 L. ed. 411, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 191; United States v. Cerecedo Hermanos y Compañia, 209 U. The method of the Treasury Department for apportionment of drawback duty is the only practical method.

The underlying principle of a tariff law should be considered.

The construction of this statute and the reasonable regulation thereunder have been in effect for over half a century; where questioned they have been approved by the courts; and by constant re-enactment and failure to make any change they must be held to have been approved by Congress, and the question is no longer open.

Hahn v. United States, 107 U. S. 402, 406, 27 L. ed. 527, 528, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494.

This is a suit to recover the difference between the amount of drawback allowed by the government to the appellant, a corporation, as an exporter of linseed-oil cake, and the amount to which it claims to be entitled under § 22 of the act of Congress, effective August 27, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 509, chap. 349), which reads as follows:

"That where imported materials on which duties have been paid are used in the manufacture of articles manufactured or produced in the United States, there shall be allowed on the exportation of such articles a drawback equal in amount to the duties paid on the materials used, less one per centum of such duties." . . .

It is further provided in the section that the drawback due thereon shall be paid to the manufacturer, producer, or exporter "under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe."

The appellant imported large quantities of linseed upon which it paid a specific duty of 20 cents per bushel of 56 pounds. This seed, when treated by a simple process, yielded about 20 pounds of linseed oil and about 36 pounds of linseed-oil cake, to the bushel. The oil was much more valuable than the oil cake, the latter being composed of the solid substance of the seed and a small amount of oil not recovered, which made it valuable as a feed for stock,—it is a by-product, and, except for the small amount of oil in it, would be mere waste.

Appellant exported large quantities of oil cake, derived from seed which it had imported, and made demand in proper form for the drawback provided for by the act of Congress.

The law providing for such drawbacks has differed in form of expression from time to time, but, since the Act of August 5, 1861 [12 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 45], it has not differed in [144] substance from the Act of 1894, as we have quoted it. The number of articles to which the law is applicable is very great, among them, notably, "refined sugar and syrup which come from imported raw sugar, and refined sugar and syrup which come from imported molasses."

The court of claims found that:

"From August 5th, 1861, to the present time, the practice of the Treasury Department, where several articles are manufactured from the same imported material, has been to calculate and to pay the drawback by distributing the duty paid on the imported material between such articles in proportion to the value, and not in proportion to their weight, as well where the imported material paid a specific as well as where it paid an ad valorem duty. Such calculation and payment had been made under Treasury Department regulations."

The claim of the appellant is that the correct construction of the section relied upon requires that the drawback should be computed on the basis of the weights of the oil and oil cake derived by the process of manufacture from the seed, instead of on the basis of the values of the two products, as it was computed by the government, and the question for decision is whether the Department regulation is a valid interpretation of the statute.

The act quoted provides that where imported materials are used in this country in the manufacture of articles which are exported, a drawback shall be allowed "equal in amount to the duties paid on the material used," less 1 per centum. What was the amount of duty paid on the small amount of oil and on the large amount of solid substance, the hull and the fiber, which made up the exported oil cake? Was it substantially two thirds of the total, determined by weight,—on 36 of 56 pounds,—or was it about one fourth of the total as determined by the relative values of the oil and of the oil cake derived from the seed?

[145] The terms of the provision show that the contingency of having one kind of dutiable material, from which two or more kinds of manufactured products might be derived, is not specifically provided for. Obviously only a part, the least valuable part, of the materials or ingredients of the linseed, were used in the making of oil cake, and therefore the problem of determining the "drawback equal in amount to the duty paid" on the part so used—the solid parts of the seed and the small amount of oil in the oil cake—was not a simple or an easy one.

The statute, thus indefinite if not ambiguous, called for construction by the Department, and the regulation adapted to cases such as we have here commends itself strongly to our judgment.

It does not seem possible that Congress could have intended that two thirds of the duty should be returned when one quarter in value of the manufactured product should be exported; or that the exporter should retain 20 pounds of oil, estimated in the findings as worth about 7½ cents a pound, derived from each bushel of seed, and recover two thirds of the duty paid when he exported 36 pounds of seed cake, worth slightly more than 1 cent a pound, derived from the same bushel of seed. Such results—they must follow the acceptance of the appellant's contention—should be allowed only under compulsion of imperative language such as is not to be found in the section we are considering.

We prefer the reasonable interpretation of the Department, which results in a refund of one quarter of the duty when one quarter of the value of the product is exported.

From Edwards v. Darby, 12 Wheat. 206, 6 L. ed. 603, to Jacobs v. Prichard, 223 U. S. 200, 56 L. ed. 405, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289, it has been the settled law that when uncertainty or ambiguity, such as we have here, is found in a statute, great weight will be given to the contemporaneous construction by Department officials, who were called upon to act under the law and to carry its provisions [146] into effect,—especially where such construction has been long continued, as it was in this case for almost forty years before the petition was filed. United States v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169, 30 L. ed. 627, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510.

To this we must add that the Department's interpretation of the statute has had such implied approval by Congress that it should not be disturbed, particularly as applied to linseed and its products.

The drawback provision, under which the construction complained of originated, continued unchanged from 1861 until the revision of the statute in 1870, and the court of claims finds that the rule for determining the drawback on oil cake was applied during the whole of that period of almost ten years. The Tariff Act, approved July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. at L. 256, 265, chap. 255), expressly provided, in the flaxseed or linseed paragraph, "that no drawback shall be allowed on oil cake made from imported seed," and this provision was continued in the Tariff Act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. at L. 488, 513, chap. 121), and in the Act of October 1, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 567, 586, chap. 1244). But in the Act of 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 509, 523, chap. 349), the prohibition was eliminated, thus restoring the law on this subject as applied to this material to what it was in substance from 1861 to 1870. United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52, 59, 30 L. ed. 559, 561, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 413. During all the intervening twenty-four years this rule of the Department with respect to drawbacks had been widely applied to many articles of much greater importance than linseed or its derivatives, and the practice was continued, linseed included after 1894, until the petition in this case was filed. The re-enacting of the drawback provision four times, without substantial change, while this method of determining what should be paid under it was being constantly employed, amounts to an implied legislative recognition and approval of the executive construction of the statute (United States v. Philbrick, supra; United States v. Falk, 204 U. S. 143, 152, 51 L. ed. 411, 414, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 191; United States v. Cerecedo [147] Hermanos y Compañia, 209 U. S. 337, 52 L. ed. 821, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532), for Congress is presumed to have legislated with knowledge of such an established usage of an executive department of the government (United States v. Bailey, 9 Pet. 238, 256, 9 L. ed. 113, 120).

This case would not deserve even the limited discussion which we thus have given it were it not for the extensive and long-continued application of the regulation of the Department to imported and exported materials other than such as are here involved. This specific case is sufficiently ruled by the clear and satisfactory decision of the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, rendered twenty-two years ago, in United States v. Dean Linseed-Oil Co. 31 C. C. A. 51, 57 U. S. App. 716, 87 Fed. 453, in which the court of claims found authority for dismissing the plaintiff's petition. The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

Postoffice — carrying mails — power to penalize delays.

1. The long-continued failure of the Postmaster General to impose fines for delays of less than twenty-four hours in transporting the mails cannot be asserted as the equivalent of a departmental declaration that no such power existed in behalf of a railway company which had notice before it contracted to carry the mail that failure to maintain train schedules was regarded by Congress and by the Postoffice Department as a violation of mail-carrying contracts, justifying the imposition of fines or deductions, and that both believed that there was authority under the customary contracts and the law to impose such deductions.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Postoffice — mail transportation — powers of Postmaster General — failure to exercise — abrogation.

2. Failure of the Postmaster General to exercise his power to impose fines for delays of less than twenty-four hours in transporting the mails does not make against the proper use of such power when, in the judgment of that official, adequate occasion for its use may arise.

[For other cases, see Postoffice, IV. c, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Submitted January 19, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims to review a judgment which dismissed a petition by a railway company to recover back deductions withheld by the Postoffice Department from the contract price for transporting the mail. Affirmed.

See same case below, 53 Ct. Cl. 630.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alexander Britton and Evans Browne submitted the cause for appellant:

The announcement of schedules for the arrival and departure of trains does not give rise to a contract that, as to a particular train, the schedule will be complied with, the liability for not complying being one based on negligence in the proper operation of the train in connection with the business of the carrier.

6 Cyc. 587.

That rendition of a service of not less than six round trips a week was and is the limit of the absolute obligation of the railroads is recognized by the court of claims itself in the case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. United States, 53 Ct. Cl. 633, No. 31,550, decided March 25, 1918, on findings of fact without an opinion.

The decisions show:

(1) That for one year, 1879–1880, there was a law to impose fines for a mere failure of a train on any day to observe its schedule.

(2) That such law and the failures therein provided for were distinct from and in addition to the matter for which U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3962, Comp. Stat. § 7450, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 163, provided.

(3) That the Act of June 26, 1906, only applied to trains under contract to observe schedule time, and has no application to this case.

(4) That the Act of March 2, 1907, referred to in the petition, specifically required all contractors to maintain their regular train schedules as to time of arrival and departure; but the deductions involved in this case were made prior to the taking effect of this act, and are not affected thereby.

Assistant Attorney General Spellacy submitted the cause for appellee. Special Assistants to the Attorney General Zeisler and Weston were on the brief:

The Postmaster General had power to enter into a contract with appellant whereby the latter was bound to maintain the train schedules published by it from time to time.

Under the contract in question the appellant agreed, in carrying the mails, to maintain its train schedules.

Mr. Benjamin Carter filed a brief as amicus curiæ.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, in its petition, alleges: That in June, 1906, it entered into contracts with the Postoffice Department to transport the mails over three designated routes "upon the conditions prescribed by law and the regulations of the Department applicable to railroad mail service;" that during the fiscal year 1907 (the petition was not filed until December 19, 1912), the Department withheld from its stipulated pay $3,355.48, "as a penalty imposed on account of late arrivals . . . of trains, and failure to perform service on the . . . mail routes," and that such deductions were "unlawfully withheld." The prayer was for judgment for the full amount of the deductions,—which are also designated in the record as fines or penalties. The petition was dismissed by the court of claims.

The appellant acquiesced in the deductions when they were made, accepted the reduced compensation without protest or objection, except in one instance, when the item complained of was adjusted to its satisfaction, and continued to perform the contracts to the end of their [149] four-year periods without complaint as to the reasonableness of the deductions involved. And thus it comes admitting that it freely entered into the contracts, fully performed them, and accepted pay for such performance, but asking judgment for deductions which it avers were "unlawfully withheld" more than five years before the petition was filed.

The contracts were of the type, familiar in many reported cases, evidenced by "distance circulars," orders establishing the routes, specific agreements on the part of the contractor that it would perform the service "upon the conditions prescribed by law and the regulations of the Department applicable to railroad service," and that the "adjustment" should be "subject to future orders and to fines and deductions."

Among the applicable "conditions prescribed by law" were Rev. Stat. § 3962, Comp. Stat. § 7450, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 163, that the Postmaster General might "make deductions from the pay of contractors, for failure to perform service according to contract, and impose fines upon them for other delinquencies;" Rev. Stat. § 4002, Comp. Stat. § 7483, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 195, authorizing contracts for the conveyance of the mails "with due frequency and speed;" and the Act of June 26, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 467, 472, chap. 3546, Comp. Stat. § 7297, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 90), commanding the Postmaster General to require all railroads carrying mail to comply with the terms of their contracts "as to time of arrival and departure of mails," and "to impose and collect reasonable fines for delay" when not caused by unavoidable accidents or conditions.

It is conceded by the appellant that the Postmaster General had authority under Rev. Stat. § 3962, to make deductions from the pay when a "trip was not performed" within twenty-four hours of the stipulated time for performance. But it is contended that he had no authority to make deductions or impose fines for shorter delays,—and this is the sole question upon which this appeal is pursued into this court.

[150] It is argued for the appellant: That power to make the disputed deductions must be found, if at all, in the provision of Rev. Stat. § 3962, that the Postmaster General may "make deductions from the pay of contractors for failure to perform service according to contract, and impose fines upon them for other delinquencies;" that when the contracts were made, long departmental construction had limited the failure to perform service, described in the act, to twenty-four hours of delay in the arrival of trains, and that failure, from 1872, when the section was enacted, to 1907, to impose fines or deductions for shorter delays, amounted to a construction by the Department that authority to impose fines upon contractors for delinquencies did not warrant deductions for failure to maintain train schedules when the delay was less than twenty-four hours.

We need consider only this last contention, and in reply it is pointed out that the findings of fact show: that the amount and rates of compensation were determined by the Department for the various routes, between the 10th and 26th of September, 1906, though effective as of the first day of the preceding July; that in October, 1905, the Postmaster General, "on account of the failure to observe schedules on routes or parts of routes," issued an order that deductions should be made, in sums stated, after December 31, 1905, when trains arrived at termini or junction points fifteen or more minutes late, a designated number of times in a quarter; and that the Act of Congress, approved June 26, 1906, referred to, declared it to be the duty of the Postmaster General to impose and collect reasonable fines for failure of railroads to comply with the terms of their contracts with respect to the time of arrival and departure of mails. This act was repealed in the following year, but the substance of it was immediately re-enacted in a more adaptable form.

Thus, the appellant had notice before it made the contracts [151] under discussion that failure to maintain train schedules was regarded by Congress and the Department as a violation of mail-carrying contracts, justifying the imposition of fines or deductions, and that both believed there was authority under the customary contracts and the law to impose such deductions. The Act of June 26, 1906, was not a grant of new power to the Postmaster General to impose such fines or deductions, but was an imperative direction to him to exercise the power which, it assumes, he already had for that purpose.

This action of Congress and of the Department is sufficient answer to the claim, if it were otherwise sound, that failure to exercise the power to impose fines for such a cause amounted to a departmental declaration that no such power existed.

But the contention is not sound. Failure, within moderate limits, to maintain train schedules, may well have been regarded by the Postmaster General as a necessary evil to be tolerated, and not to call for the exercise of his power to impose fines under the statute, when more flagrant neglect to maintain such schedules might very justly require him to exercise such authority in order to prevent intolerable public inconvenience. We cannot doubt that the contracts of the appellant, and the law which was a part of them, furnished ample authority for the action of the Department in this case, and that omission to exercise such power did not make against the proper use of it when, in the judgment of the Postmaster General, adequate occasion for its use should arise.

We need not pursue the subject further. The principles involved are adequately and admirably discussed by the court of claims in its opinion, rendered in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. United States, 53 Ct. Cl. 238, upon authority of which this case was decided.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

v.
WILBUR H. MOHNEY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 152–158.)

Carriers — limitation of liability — employee riding on pass — when transportation is not interstate.

1. The mental purpose of a railway employee traveling on an annual pass, good only over a line wholly within the state, to continue his journey into another state, using another carrier to a point still within the state, where he expected to find awaiting him another pass from the first carrier which would be good for the interstate part of his journey, does not make him an interstate passenger while travel-

It is apparent that when, on account of the fog, the engineer did not see the signals, or disregarded them, he was not guilty of negligence which was wilful and wanton. It was not a conscious failure to observe due care. This omission of duty, even though constituting negligence, did not amount to wantonness or wilfulness; and there is no evidence of wilfulness or wantonness in the record.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, whom we shall refer to as the plaintiff, brought suit against the petitioner, defendant, to recover damages for severe injuries which he sustained in a rear-end collision on defendant's railroad, which he averred was caused by the gross negligence of the engineer of the [153] train following that on which he was a passenger, in failing to look for and heed danger signals which indicated that the track ahead was occupied. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as an engineer, with a run between Air Line Junction, at Toledo, and Collinwood, a suburb of Cleveland, wholly within the state of Ohio. As an incident to his employment he was given an annual pass, good between Air Line Junction and Collinwood, which contained the release following:

"In consideration of receiving this free pass, each of the persons named thereon, using the same, voluntarily assumes all risk of accidents, and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable under any circumstances, whether of negligence of itself, its agents, or otherwise, for any injury to his or her person, or for any loss or injury to his or her property; and that as for him or her, in the use of this pass, he or she will not consider the company as a common carrier, and liable to him or her as such.

"And, as a condition precedent to the issuing and use thereof, each of the persons named on the face of this pass states that he or she is not prohibited by law from receiving free transportation, and that the pass will be lawfully used."

Having been informed that his mother had died at her home near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, the plaintiff, desiring to attend her funeral, applied to the defendant for and obtained a pass for himself and wife from Toledo to Youngstown, Ohio, via Ashtabula, and was promised that another pass for himself and wife would be left with the agent of the company at Youngstown, good for the remainder, the interstate part, of the journey to Pittsburgh. But the line of the defendant via Ashtabula to Youngstown was much longer and required a number of hours more for the journey than it did to go via Cleveland, using the Erie Railroad from that city to Youngstown, and for this reason, the record shows, the plaintiff Mohney, [154] before leaving home, decided that his wife should not accompany him, and that he would make the journey by a train of the defendant, which used its own rails to Cleveland, and from Cleveland to Youngstown used the tracks of the Erie Railroad Company, and at Youngstown returned to the road of the defendant, over which it ran to Pittsburgh. The transportation which he had received via Ashtabula could not be used over the shorter route, and therefore the plaintiff presented his annual pass for transportation from Toledo to Cleveland, intending to pay his fare from Cleveland to Youngstown over the Erie Railroad, leave the train at the Erie station at Youngstown, inquire by telephone as to the time and place of the burial of his mother, and then go to the New York Central station, a half mile away, obtain the pass which was to be left there for him, and go forward to Pittsburgh on the next convenient train.

The train on which Mohney was a passenger was wrecked between Toledo and Cleveland. It had come to a stop at a station and the second section of the train ran past two block signals, indicating danger ahead, and collided with the rear car of the first section, in which Mohney was riding, causing him serious injury.

The case was tried on stipulated facts and the testimony of the plaintiff. The trial court concluded that Mohney, at the time he was injured, was on an intrastate journey, using an intrastate pass, and that by the law of Ohio, the release upon it was void as against public policy. Thereupon, a jury being waived, the court entered judgment in plaintiff's favor.

The state court of appeals, differing with the trial court, concluded that Mohney was an interstate passenger when injured, and that the release on the pass was valid, under the ruling in Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 234 U. S. 576, 58 L. ed. 1476, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 964. But the court went further and affirmed the judgment on two grounds; by a divided [155] court, on the ground that the pass was issued to Mohney as part consideration of his employment, and, all judges concurring, for the reason that "we are clearly of the opinion that the negligence in this case, under the evidence, was wilful and wanton." For these reasons it was held that the release on the pass did not constitute a defense to the action.

The supreme court of the state denied a motion for an order requiring the court of appeals to certify the record to it for review, and the case is here on writ of certiorari.

The propriety of the use of the annual pass by Mohney for such a personal journey, and that the release on it was not valid under Ohio law, were not questioned, and the sole defense urged by the railroad company was, and now is, that his purpose to continue his journey to a destination in Pennsylvania rendered him an interstate passenger, subject to Federal law from the time he entered the train at Toledo, and that the release on the pass was valid, under 234 U. S. 576, supra.

The three freight cases on which the defendant relies for its contention that the plaintiff was an interstate passenger when injured, all proceed upon the principle that the essential character of the transportation, and not the purpose, or mental state, of the shipper, determines whether state or national law applies to the transaction involved.

Thus, in Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, the owner's state of mind in relation to the logs, his intent to export them, and even his partial preparation to do so, did not exempt them from state taxation, because they did not pass within the domain of the Federal law until they had "been shipped, or entered with a common carrier for transportation to another state, or had been started upon such transportation in a continuous route or journey."

In Southern P. Terminal Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U. S. 498, 527, 55 L. ed. 310, 320, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 279, the cotton-seed [156] cake and meal, although billed to Galveston, were "all destined for export, and by their delivery to the Galveston, Harrisburg, & San Antonio Railway they must be considered as having been delivered to a carrier for transportation to their foreign destination. . . . The case, therefore, comes under Coe v. Errol, supra." The mental purpose of Young, and his attempted practice by intrastate billing, was to keep within the domain of the state law; but his contracts, express and implied, brought the discrimination complained of in the case within the scope of the Interstate Commerce Act.

In Railroad Commission v. Worthington, 225 U. S. 101, 56 L. ed. 1004, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653, the Commission attempted to regulate the rate on "lake cargo-coal," because it was often billed from the mines to Huron, or other ports within the state, but this court found that the established "lake cargo-coal" rate was intended to apply, and in practice did apply, only "to such coal as was in fact placed on vessels for carriage beyond the state," and obviously, "by every fair test, transportation of this coal from the mines to upper lake ports is an interstate carriage." For this reason the enforcement of the order of the State Commission was enjoined as an attempt to regulate and control interstate commerce. Here again it was the committing of a designated kind of coal to a carrier for transportation in interstate commerce that rendered the Federal law applicable.

To what extent the analogy between the shipments of property and the transportation of passengers may profitably be pressed, we need not inquire, for in this case the only contract between the carrier defendant and the plaintiff was the annual pass issued to the latter. This written contract, with its release, is the sole reliance of the defendant. But that contract in terms was good only between Air Line Junction and Collinwood, over a line of track wholly within Ohio, and the company was charged [157] with notice when it issued the pass that the public policy of that state rendered the release upon it valueless. The purpose of the plaintiff to continue his journey into Pennsylvania would have been of no avail in securing him transportation over the Erie line to Youngstown; for that he must pay the published fare; and very surely the release on the pass to Collinwood would not have attached to the ticket to Youngstown. Whether there was a similar release on the pass to Pittsburgh, which Mohney expected to get at Youngstown, the record does not disclose, and it is of no consequence whether there was or not. The contract which the defendant had with its passenger was in writing and was for an intrastate journey, and it cannot be modified by the purpose of Mohney to continue his journey into another state, under a contract of carriage with another carrier, for which he would have been obliged to pay the published rate, or by an intended second contract with the defendant in terms which are not disclosed. The mental purpose of one of the parties to a written contract cannot change its terms. Southern P. Co. v. Arizona, 249 U. S. 472, 63 L. ed. 713, P.U.R.1919D, 462, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 313. For these reasons the judgment of the trial court was right and should have been affirmed.

But the court of appeals affirmed the judgment on two grounds, one of which was that all of the judges were "clearly of the opinion that the negligence in the case, under the evidence, was wilful and wanton." This court does not weigh the evidence in such cases as we have here, but it has been looked into sufficiently to satisfy us that the argument that there is no evidence whatever in the record to support such a finding cannot be sustained.

A carrier by rail is liable to a trespasser or to a mere licensee wilfully or wantonly injured by its servants in charge of its train (Thomp. Neg. §§ 3307, 3308, and 3309, and the same sections in White's Supplement thereto), and a sound public policy forbids that a less onerous rule should be applied to a [158] passenger injured by like negligence when lawfully upon one of its trains. This much of protection was due the plaintiff as a human being, who had intrusted his safety to defendant's keeping. Southern P. Co. v. Schuyler, 227 U. S. 601, 603, 57 L. ed. 662, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 901, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Maucher, 248 U. S. 359, 363, 63 L. ed. 294, 296, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 108.

The evidence in the record as to the terms and conditions upon which the pass was issued to the plaintiff is so meager that, since it is not necessary to a decision of the case, we need not and do not consider the extent to which the case of Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 234 U. S. 576, 58 L. ed. 1476, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 964, is applicable to an employee using a pass furnished to him seemingly as a necessary incident to his employment.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Van Devanter concur in the result, being of opinion that Mohney was using the annual pass in an interstate journey, and that to such a use of the pass the Ohio law was inapplicable, but that the releasing clause on the pass did not cover or embrace his injury because the latter resulted from wilful or wanton negligence, as to which such a clause is of no force or effect.

v.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. (No. 212.)

ASH SHEEP COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. (No. 285.)

Indian lands — trespass — grazing live stock.

1. Lands within that part of the Crow Indian Reservation in Montana as to which the Indians released their possessory right to the United States by an agreement ratified and amended by the Act of April 27, 1904, which contains many provisions intended to secure to the Indians the fullest possible value for what are referred to in the grant as "their lands," and to make use of the proceeds for their benefit, are Indian lands within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2117, forbidding the pasturing of cattle upon lands belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe without the consent of such tribe.

[For other cases, see Indians, V. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Indian lands — trespass — grazing sheep.

2. Sheep must be regarded as cattle within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2117, which forbids any person to drive or otherwise convey any stock of horses, mules, or cattle to range and feed on any land belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe without the consent of such tribe, the courts and Department of Justice having so interpreted this provision for almost fifty years.

[For other cases, see Indians, V. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Judgment — conclusiveness — recovery in equity as bar to recovery at law.

3. The recovery of nominal damages in an equity suit to restrain a trespass does not bar the recovery at law of the statutory penalty for the same trespass, the claim for such penalty having been rejected in the equity suit because pursued in an action in which it could not be entertained.

[For other cases, see Judgment, III. j, 1, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

[Nos. 212 and 285.]

Argued January 30, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the District of Montana enjoining the grazing of sheep on lands asserted to be Indian lands. Affirmed. Also

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court for the District of Montana in favor of the United States in a suit to recover a penalty for the same trespass. Affirmed.

Note.—On conclusiveness of judgments, generally—see notes to Sharon v. Terry, 1 L.R.A. 572; Bollong v. Schuyler Nat. Bank, 3 L.R.A. 142; Wiese v. San Francisco Musical Fund Soc. 7 L.R.A. 577; Morrill v. Morrill, 11 L.R.A. 155; Shores v. Hooper, 11 L.R.A. 308; Bank of United States v. Beverly, 11 L. ed. U. S. 76; Johnson Steel Street R. Co. v. Wharton, 38 L. ed. U. S. 429; and Southern P. R. Co. v. United States, 42 L. ed. U. S. 355.

See same case below in No. 212, 162 C. C. A. 607, 250 Fed. 591; in No. 285, 165 C. C. A. 469, 254 Fed. 59.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Cornelius B. Nolan argued the cause, and, with Mr. William Scallon, field a brief for the Ash Sheep Company:

When the act in question was passed, the title to the land was in the United States. The only right that the Indians had was a possessory right.

Johnson v. M'Intosh, 8 Wheat. 543, 5 L. ed. 681; Spalding v. Chandler, 160 U. S. 394, 40 L. ed. 469, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360.

This right of occupancy could be terminated by act of Congress as well as by treaty or agreement with the Indians.

Beecher v. Wetherby, 95 U. S. 517, 24 L. ed. 440; Buttz v. Northern P. R. Co. 119 U. S. 73, 30 L. ed. 337, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100; Lone Wolf v. Hitchcock, 187 U. S. 553, 47 L. ed. 299, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 216.

When this right of occupancy terminated or was abandoned with the approval of the United States, all of the Indian rights were extinguished.

Buttz v. Northern P. R. Co. 119 U. S. 73, 30 L. ed. 337, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100; United States v. Cook, 19 Wall. 591, 22 L. ed. 210.

It was clearly the intention that every portion of this land should at all times be accessible to the public, so that settlements might be made by those intending to do so under the homestead and other laws, and the leasing of the same by the Indian Department necessarily would interfere with this being done. If any trust arose at all, it attached to the money which was to be paid, and not to the land itself.

United States v. Choctaw Nation, 179 U. S. 494, 45 L. ed. 291, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 149.

This matter has been already under consideration by this court, and a conclusion reached at variance with the government's contention.

Bean v. Morris, 221 U. S. 485, 55 L. ed. 821, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703.

The words "public lands" are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws.

Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. ed. 769.

The words "public land" have long had a settled meaning in the legislation of Congress, and, when a different intention is not clearly expressed, are used to designate such land as is subject to sale or other disposal under general laws.

Northern Lumber Co. v. O'Brien, 71 C. C. A. 598, 139 Fed. 614; United States v. Blendaur, 63 C. C. A. 636, 128 Fed. 910; Jackman v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 24 N. M. 278, 170 Pac. 1036.

These lands became public when they were thrown open for settlement, if not before; and such being their character, the injunction was improperly issued.

Buford v. Houtz, 133 U. S. 320, 33 L. ed. 618, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305.

The statute in question is a penal one, and the rule of strict construction applies. Nothing should be included that fairly does not come within the express provisions of the law.

The term "cattle," as generally understood, is used in reference to animals of the bovine species.

State ex rel. Esser v. District Ct. 42 Nev. 218, 174 Pac. 1023.

In construing any part of the United States Revised Statutes, it is admissible, and often necessary, to recur to its connection in the act of which it was originally a part.

United States v. Hirsch, 100 U. S. 33, 25 L. ed. 539; United States v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508, 25 L. ed. 631; The Conqueror, 166 U. S. 110, 41 L. ed. 937, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 33 L. ed. 1080, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

In the equitable action that was instituted, the government sought to recover the statutory penalty. It is true, that no express mention is made of the fact that the damage demanded was by virtue of the law in question. It is true, nevertheless, that the right to recover the damage under this law was asserted. In the equitable action the government insisted that, regardless of the damage that was done, the statute fixed the amount of it, and it was entitled to recover $1 per head. The trial court decided against it, and that decision stands unappealed from, and has in it the element of finality. The decision in that case, adverse to the United States, as to its right to recover this money, is determinative of its right to do so in the present action.

Forsyth v. Hammond, 166 U. S. 506, 41 L. ed. 1095, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665; Southern P. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 42 L. ed. 355, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Washington Gaslight Co. v. District of Columbia, 161 U. S. 316, 40 L. ed. 712, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564.

The United States, in demanding damages, as it did, in the equitable action, should now be estopped (having recovered damages in that action for the injury done) from maintaining the present action to recover additional damages.

Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How. 87, 11 L. ed. 506; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Drake, 131 C. C. A. 82, 214 Fed. 536.

Assistant Attorney General Nebeker argued the cause, and, with Mr. W. W. Dyar, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, filed a brief for the United States:

By the Act of Congress of April 27, 1904, the unqualified sale and cession provided for by the agreement was converted into a cession and relinquishment in trust to sell and dispose of the lands for the benefit of the Indians, and pay over to them the proceeds. The entire beneficial interest remained in the tribe, and the lands themselves remained Indian lands until disposed of under the trust.

Sheep are included in U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2117, Comp. Stat. § 4107, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 795, which imposes a penalty of $1 per head for grazing "any stock of horses, mules, or cattle" upon Indian lands without the consent of the tribe.

Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 628, 33 L. ed. 1080, 1083, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

A judgment is not conclusive on any question which, from the nature of the case or the form of the action, could not have been adjudicated in the case in which it was rendered.

2 Black, Judgm. § 618; 23 Cyc. 1317.

There are at least three distinct reasons why the question of penalties could not have been adjudicated in the equity suit:

(a) Equity never, under any circumstances, lends its aid to enforce a forfeiture or penalty, or anything in the nature of either.

Marshall v. Vicksburg, 15 Wall. 146, 149, 21 L. ed. 121, 122; Livingston v. Tompkins, 4 Johns. Ch. 415, 8 Am. Dec. 598; 2 Story, Eq. § 1319.

The fact that the remedy prescribed is a civil suit does not prevent § 2117 from being a criminal statute.

United States v. Stevenson, 215 U. S. 190, 54 L. ed. 153, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 35; Lees v. United States, 150 U. S. 476, 37 L. ed. 1150, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 163; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524.

(b) The case presented by the pleadings was solely one of civil damages for trespass. Penalties were wholly outside the issues.

Fifield v. Edwards, 39 Mich. 266.

(c) The parties were the same, but the United States sued in entirely different capacities.

Rathbone v. Hooney, 58 N. Y. 467; Sonnenberg v. Steinbach, 9 S. D. 518, 62 Am. St. Rep. 885, 70 N. W. 655; Allison v. Little, 93 Ala. 150, 9 So. 388; Landon v. Townshend, 112 N. Y. 93, 8 Am. St. Rep. 712, 19 N. E. 424, 129 N. Y. 166, 29 N. E. 71.

[163] Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases were argued and will be decided together.

No. 212 is an appeal from a decree, entered in a suit in equity, in favor of the government, granting a permanent injunction restraining the appellant from trespassing upon described lands in Montana by grazing sheep thereon, and for nominal damages for such trespass.

No. 285 is a proceeding in error, in which reversal is sought of a judgment rendered in an action at law against plaintiff in error, appellant in the equity suit, for a penalty for the same trespass.

The validity of the right asserted by the government, in both cases, turns upon whether the lands involved were "Indian lands" or "public lands." If they were the former, the decree in the equity case should be affirmed; but in the law case there would remain the question as to whether "sheep" were within the terms of the act under which the penalty was imposed.

In both cases the government contends that the appellant violated § 2117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Comp. Stat. § 4107, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 795), which reads as follows:

"Every person who drives or otherwise conveys any stock of horses, mules, or cattle, to range and feed on any land belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe, without the consent of such tribe, is liable to a penalty of one dollar for each animal of such stock."

The company admits that it pastured 5,000 sheep on the described lands without the consent of the Crow tribe of Indians or of the United States, but denies that they were "Indian lands," and contends that they were "public lands," upon which it was lawful for it to pasture its stock.

Whether the described lands were Indian or public lands depends upon the construction to be given the act of Congress approved April 27, 1904 (33 Stat. at L. 352, chap. 1624), entitled, [164] "An Act to Ratify and Amend an Agreement with the Indians of the Crow Reservation in Montana, and Making Appropriations to Carry the Same into Effect."

The agreement embodied in this act of Congress provided for a division of the Crow Indian Reservation in Montana on boundary lines which were described, and the lands involved in this case were within the part of the Reservation as to which the Indians, in terms, "ceded, granted, and relinquished" to the United States all of their "right, title, and interest."

The argument of the Sheep Company is, that the United States being owner of the fee of the land before the agreement, the effect of this grant and release of their possessory right by the Indians was to vest the complete and perfect title in the government, and thereby make the territory a part of the public lands, with the interest of the Indians transferred to the proceeds to be derived from them. For this conclusion the following cases are cited: United States v. Choctaw Nation, 179 U. S. 494, 45 L. ed. 291, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 149; Bean v. Morris, 86 C. C. A. 519, 159 Fed. 651, s. c. 221 U. S. 485, 55 L. ed. 821, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703. But in the first of these cases the Indians parted with their possessory rights for a cash payment by the United States (p. 527), and in the second, the character of the agreement under which the Indian title was said, incidentally, to have terminated, does not appear.

Whether or not the government became trustee for the Indians, or acquired an unrestricted title by the cession of their lands, depends in each case upon the terms of the agreement or treaty by which the cession was made. Minnesota v. Hitchcock, 185 U. S. 373, 394, 398, 46 L. ed. 954, 965, 967, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 650; United States v. Mille Lac Band of Chippewa Indians, 229 U. S. 498, 509, 57 L. ed. 1299, 1305, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811.

The agreement we have in this case is elaborate, and, in consideration of the grant by the Indians of their possessory right, the government assumed many obligations with respect to the lands and the proceeds of them,—notably, [165] that it would sell the land to settlers, except sections 16 and 36, for not less than $4 per acre, and would pay the proceeds to the Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in a manner prescribed. Thus, the government contracted to expend $90,000 of the proceeds of the land in the extension of the irrigation system on the Reservation remaining; $295,000 in the purchase of stock to be placed on the Reservation, with a further contingent purchase in contemplation of $200,000; $40,000 in fencing; $100,000 for schools; and $10,000 for a hospital for the Indians, for the maintenance of which $50,000 additional was to be held in trust. It was further provided, that to the extent that feasible irrigation prospects could be found, parts of the released lands should be withdrawn under the Reclamation Act and be disposed of within five years, but not for less than $4 an acre.

There were many other like provisions, all intended to secure to the Indians the fullest possible value for what are referred to in the agreement as "their lands," and to make use of the proceeds for their benefit.

It was provided that semiannual reports should be made by the Secretary of the Interior to the Indians, showing the amounts expended from time to time and the amounts remaining in each of the several funds.

It is obvious that the relation thus established by the act between the government and the tribe of Indians was essentially that of trustee and beneficiary, and that the agreement contained many features appropriate to a trust agreement to sell lands and devote the proceeds to the interests of the cestui que trust. Minnesota v. Hitchcock, supra. And that this was precisely the light in which the Congress regarded the whole transaction is clear from the terms of the concluding section, the eighth:

"That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any portion of the land [166] herein described, except sections sixteen and thirty-six or the equivalent in each township, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any portion thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received, as herein provided." 33 Stat. chap. 1624, pp. 352, 361.

Taking all of the provisions of the agreement together, we cannot doubt that while the Indians by the agreement released their possessory right to the government, the owner of the fee, so that, as their trustee, it could make perfect title to purchasers, nevertheless, until sales should be made, any benefits which might be derived from the use of the lands would belong to the beneficiaries, and not to the trustee, and that they did not become "public lands" in the sense of being subject to sale or other disposition, under the General Land Laws. Union P. R. Co. v. Harris, 215 U. S. 386, 388, 54 L. ed. 246, 247, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 138. They were subject to sale by the government, to be sure, but in the manner and for the purposes provided for in the special agreement with the Indians, which was embodied in the Act of April 27, 1904 (33 Stat. at L. 352, chap. 1624), and as to this point the case is ruled by the Hitchcock and Chippewa Cases, supra. Thus, we conclude that the lands described in the bill were "Indian lands" when the company pastured its sheep upon them, in violation of § 2117 of Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat. § 4107, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 795), and the decree in No. 212 must be affirmed.

There remains the question as to the construction of Rev. Stat. § 2117.

In the law case it is admitted in the bill of exceptions that the Sheep Company, without the permission of the Crow tribe of Indians or of the United States, drove, ranged, and grazed 5,000 head of sheep on the land described in the complaint, and that at the time no settlement [167] or entries thereon had been authorized under acts of Congress. The judgment against the company was for $5,000,—$1 for each sheep pastured on the land.

The company contends that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that Rev. Stat. § 2117, imposes the penalty prescribed only for ranging and feeding on the lands of an Indian tribe without permission "any stock of horses, mules, or cattle," and that "sheep" are not within its terms.

If this were a recent statute, and if we were giving it a first interpretation, we might hesitate to say that by the use of the word "cattle" Congress intended to include "sheep."

But the statute is an old one, which has been interpreted in published reports of the courts for almost fifty years, and in an opinion by the Attorney General of the United States, rendered in 1884, as fairly comprehending "sheep" within the meaning of the word "cattle" as used in it.

The statute first appears as § 2 of an "Act to Regulate Trade and Intercourse with the Indian Tribes, and to Preserve Peace on the Frontiers," enacted in 1796, and was then applicable only to "any stock of horses or cattle," etc. (Act of May 19, 1796, 1 Stat. at L. 469, 470, chap. 30). The section was re-enacted without change in 1802 (Act of March 30, 1802, 2 Stat. at L. 139, 141, chap. 13). In 1834 it was given its present form, which was carried into the Revised Statutes, without change in the wording we are considering (Rev. Stat. § 2117).

In 1872 suit was brought in the United States district court for the district of Oregon, claiming that penalties under the section had been incurred by pasturing "sheep," as in this case, on Indian lands without the consent of the tribe. In a carefully prepared and clearly reasoned opinion Judge Deady overruled a demurrer to the complaint, and held that "sheep" were clearly within the mischief to be remedied, and fairly within the language of the act. [168] This case has not been overruled or modified by any later decision. The court quotes definitions of the word "cattle" from several dictionaries, emphasizing especially this from the 1837 edition of Webster:

"In its primary sense, the word includes camels, horses, asses, all the varieties of domesticated horned beasts of the bovine genus, sheep of all kinds, and goats, and perhaps swine. . . . Cattle in the United States, in common usage, signifies only beasts of the bovine genus."

Upon this authority, and applying the rule that, in determining the legislative intent, the mischief to be prevented should be looked to, and saying that "it will not be denied that sheep are as much within the mischief to be remedied as horses or oxen," the court concludes:

"I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the word cattle, as used in the Indian Intercourse Act of 1834 (Act of June 30, 1834, 4 Stat. at L. 729, chap. 161), includes, and was intended to include, sheep as well as cows and oxen." United States v. Mattock, 2 Sawy. 148, Fed. Cas. No. 15,744.

Twelve years later, in 1884, the Attorney General of the United States, in an opinion to the Secretary of War, regarded the question as so little doubtful that he disposed of it in this single sentence:

"The standard lexicographers place sheep under the head of cattle, and it would seem to be in derogation of the manifest intention of Congress to take the word in a more confined sense." 18 Ops. Atty. Gen. p. 91.

In 1875, in First Nat. Bank v. Home Sav. Bank, 21 Wall. 294, 22 L. ed. 560, this court held that the word "cattle" in a letter of credit guaranteeing "drafts on shipments of cattle" was comprehensive enough to justify the giving of credit on shipments of "hogs." This pertinent paragraph is from the opinion:

"That stock of some kind formed part of the guaranty is quite plain, but is the word 'cattle' in this connection to be confined to neat cattle alone, that is, cattle of the bovine genus? It is often so applied, but it is [quoting [169] from Worcester's Dictionary] 'also a collective name for domestic quadrupeds, generally, including not only the bovine tribe, but horses, asses, mules, sheep, goats and swine.' In its limited sense it is used to designate the different varieties of horned animals, but it is also frequently used with a broader signification as embracing animals in general which serve as food for man. In England, even in a criminal case, where there is a greater strictness of construction than in a civil controversy, 'pigs' were held to be included within the words 'any cattle.'"

The most recent definitions of the dictionaries are as follows:

Webster's New International Dictionary defines "cattle" thus: "Collectively, live animals held as property or raised for some use, now usually confined to quadrupeds of the bovine family, but sometimes including all domestic quadrupeds, as sheep, goats, horses, mules, asses, and swine, etc."

The Standard Dictionary defines the word as meaning: "Domesticated bovine animals, as oxen, cows, bulls, and calves; also, tho seldom now, as compared with former times, any live stock, kept for use or profit, as horses, camels, sheep, goats, swine, etc."

Thus, although the word "sheep" is not in the section, and although in present-day usage the word "cattle" would rarely be used with a signification sufficiently broad to include them, nevertheless: since the pasturing of sheep is plainly within the mischief at which this section aimed; since the word "cattle," which is used, may be given, say all the authorities, a meaning comprehensive enough to include them; and since the courts and the Department of Justice for almost fifty years have interpreted the section as applicable to "sheep," we accept this as the intended meaning of the section; for, had it been otherwise, Congress, we must assume, would long since have corrected it.

[170] It is argued that the rule that penal statutes must be strictly construed forbids such latitude of construction. But this is sufficiently and satisfactorily answered by repeated decisions of this court.

"The admitted rule that penal statutes are to be strictly construed is not violated by allowing their words to have full meaning, or even the more extended of two meanings, where such construction best harmonizes with the context, and most fully promotes the policy and objects of the legislature." United States v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 385, 18 L. ed. 830; United States v. Freeman, 3 How. 556, 565, 11 L. ed. 724, 728; United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 628, 33 L. ed. 1080, 1083, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

It is also contended, far from confidently, that the recovery of nominal damages in the equity suit is a bar to the recovery of the penalty in the case at law. While the amount of the statutory penalty for the trespass was prayed for in the equity suit, yet the trial court, saying that equity never aids the collection of such penalties (Marshall v. Vicksburg, 15 Wall. 146, 149, 21 L. ed. 121, 122), and that no evidence of substantial damage had been introduced, limited the recovery to $1 and costs. Rejection of a claim because pursued in an action in which it cannot be entertained does not constitute an estoppel against the pursuit of the same right in an appropriate proceeding. We agree with the court of appeals that "a judgment is not conclusive of any question which, from the nature of the case or the form of action, could not have been adjudicated in the case in which it was rendered."

It results that the decree in No. 212 and the judgment in No. 285 must both be affirmed.

[171] ROBERTO GAYON, Appt. and Plff. in Err.,
v.
THOMAS D. McCARTHY, United States Marshal for the Southern District of New York, and Samuel M. Hitchcock, United States Commissioner for the Southern District of New York.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 171–178.)

Criminal law — removal to another Federal district — prima facie case.

1. The introduction in evidence of the indictment, together with the admission of the accused that he is the person named therein, establishes a prima facie case, in the absence of other evidence, for the removal of the accused to the district in which the indictment was returned.

[For other cases, see Criminal Law, VII. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Neutrality — violations — procuring enlistment in foreign service.

2. One may be retained in the sense of the Criminal Code, § 10, providing for the punishment of whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, hires or retains another to go beyond such limits or jurisdiction with intent to be enlisted in the service of another foreign people, as effectively by a verbal as by a written promise, by a prospect for payment in the future as by immediate payment of cash.

[For other cases, see Neutrality, IV. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Criminal law — removal to another Federal district — sufficiency of evidence.

3. Substantial evidence before the United States commissioner and the court, tending to show that a penal statute of the United States had been violated, and that there was probable cause for believing the accused guilty of conspiracy to compass that violation within the district in which the indictment charging such conspiracy was returned, justifies an order for the removal of the accused to that district.

[For other cases, see Criminal Law, VII. in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

[No. 540.]

Argued January 6, 1920. Decided March 1, 1920.

APPEAL from and IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review an order for the removal to another Federal district of a person there charged with an offense against the United States. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William S. Bennet argued the cause, and, with Mr. A. M. Wattenberg, filed a brief for appellant and plaintiff in error:

The indictment is not conclusive; it is merely prima facie evidence of probable cause under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1014, Comp. Stat. § 1674, 2 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 654.

Tinsley v. Treat, 205 U. S. 20, 51 L. ed. 689, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 430.

There was no hiring or retaining by defendant within the meaning of § 10 of the Penal Code.

Assistant Attorney General Stewart argued the cause, and, with Mr. W. C. Herron, filed a brief for appellees and defendants in error:

The entire case is determined adversely to the plaintiff in error by the decision of this court in Henry v. Henkel, 235 U. S. 219, 59 L. ed. 203, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54. See also Daeche v.

S. 531, 535, 536, 59 L. ed. 705, 707, 708, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 29.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Gayon, was indicted in the southern district of Texas for conspiring (§ 37 of the Criminal Code [35 Stat. at L. 1096, chap. 321, Comp. Stat. § 10,201, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 534]) with one Naranjo, of San Antonio, Texas, and with one Mendoza, of Laredo, Texas, about January 1st, 1919, to hire and retain Foster Averitt, a citizen of the United States, to go to Mexico, there to enlist in military forces organized in the interest of Felix Diaz, then in revolt against the government of Mexico, with which the United [172] States was at peace, in violation of § 10 of the Criminal Code, as amended May 7, 1917 (40 Stat. at L. 39, chap. 11, Comp. Stat. § 10,174, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 579).

Gayon was arrested in New York, and, after a full hearing before a commissioner of the United States, was held subject to the order of the district court for his removal to Texas.

Thereupon, by petition for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, the case was removed to the district court for the southern district of New York, and, upon a hearing on a transcript of the evidence before the commissioner, that court discharged the writ of habeas corpus and entered an order that a warrant issue for the removal of the appellant to Texas. An appeal brings this order here for review.

The principles and practice applicable to this case are abundantly settled: Greene v. Henkel, 183 U. S. 249, 261, 46 L. ed. 177, 189, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 218; Beavers v. Haubart, 198 U. S. 77, 49 L. ed. 950, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; Hyde v. Shine, 199 U. S. 62, 84, 50 L. ed. 90, 97, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 760; Tinsley v. Treat, 205 U. S. 20, 51 L. ed. 689, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 430; Haas v. Henkel, 216 U. S. 462, 475, 54 L. ed. 569, 575, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, 17 Ann. Cas. 1112; Price v. Henkel, 216 U. S. 488, 490, 54 L. ed. 581, 585, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257; Hyde v. United States, 225 U. S. 347, 56 L. ed. 1114, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 614; Brown v. Elliott, 225 U. S. 392, 56 L. ed. 1136, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 812; Henry v. Henkel, 235 U. S. 219, 59 L. ed. 203, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54.

Of many errors assigned only two are argued, viz.: That the court erred in holding: (1) That the acts committed by the appellant "of which there was any evidence before the commissioner" constituted a crime under § 10 of the Penal Code, and (2) that the evidence before the commissioner showed probable cause for believing the defendant guilty of the crime charged in the indictment.

By these assignments of error the correct rule of decision is recognized, that if there was before the commissioner or district court evidence showing probable cause for believing the defendant guilty of having conspired with Naranjo or Mendoza, when either was in the southern district of Texas, to hire or retain Averitt to go to Mexico to enlist in the insurgent forces operating under General Diaz against the Mexican government, the order of the district court must be affirmed.

[173] The evidence before the commissioner, carried to the district court, may be summarized as follows:

The government introduced the indictment, and, with the admission by Gayon that he was the person named therein, rested. This established a prima facie case in the absence of other evidence. Tinsley v. Treat, 205 U. S. 20, 31, 51 L. ed. 689, 694, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 430, and cases cited.

Thereupon the testimony of the accused and of one Del Villar was introduced by appellant, and that of Averitt by the government, which we condense into narrative form:

For five years before the arrest, Del Villar, a political exile from Mexico, had maintained offices in New York, from which he had conducted a systematic propaganda in the interest of Felix Diaz and against the Mexican government.

The accused, Gayon, is a Mexican citizen, and during several administrations prior to that of Carranza had served as consul for the Mexican government at Roma, Texas, and at other places within and without the United States. For about two years he had been secretary to Del Villar, and for some time prior to his arrest was in the joint service and pay of Del Villar and General Aurelio Blanquet, the latter then in Mexico, serving with the forces of Diaz.

Naranjo was editor and publisher of a newspaper at San Antonio, Texas, called "Revista Mexicana" (Mexican Review), which was opposed to the established Mexican government, and favorable to the revolutionists operating in the interest of Diaz.

On December 12, 1918, Gayon wrote from New York to Naranjo at San Antonio to secure an advertisement in the Review for "my work 'El General Blanquet,'" saying: "There are some reasons that you may know in the next few days why I want a big circulation of the book," asking if he might send some copies to be sold at the newspaper [174] office, and concluding: "I will await your letters, hoping to give you good news in my next letter."

On December 23, 1918, Gayon wrote Naranjo, addressing him as "My dear Friend," and saying that he had received his letter of the 18th instant. In this letter a discussion of the sale of his book, "El General Blanquet," is followed by comment on the activities of other persons, in which he discourages new projects and urges joining "with the National Union Committees," which he states had already passed the embryonic state and now constitute a reality. He concludes: "God grant us, now that we are on the threshold of success, we may leave aside our obstinate custom of projecting, and go ahead to produce results exclusively."

On January 14, and again on January 21, 1919, he addressed Naranjo as "My dear Friend," and discussed further advertising and circulating of his book.

This correspondence makes it clear enough that Gayon, although in New York, in December, 1918, and January, 1919, was in close association with Naranjo, and that the two were actively engaged in promoting opposition to the established Mexican government.

On January 5, 1919, Foster Averitt, an American citizen, whose home was in Texas, called at the office of Gayon, and what passed between them is derived from the testimony of the two, as follows:

Averitt had recently resigned from the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, and, being without employment, says that he called at the office of Gayon, for the purpose of securing, if possible, a position in Mexico or Central America as an engineer. He was wearing his uniform as midshipman of the United States Navy, and he first showed Gayon some official papers, which the latter did not read, and then said that he was of the United States Navy, and that he must go at once to Mexico to see Generals Diaz and Blanquet personally. He did not give [175] any reason for desiring to see these men, but asked for letters of introduction to them, which Gayon refused until he could confer with Del Villar. Averitt returned the next day, and, after discussing with Gayon conditions in Mexico, the location of the several armed forces near the border, and whether he should go by sea to Vera Cruz or overland, he again left for the day. On returning the next day he received from Gayon two letters, one addressed to Naranjo, at San Antonio, and one to "General Aurelio Blanquet, General Headquarters, Mexico."

Gayon had no knowledge of or acquaintance with Averitt before his first call at his office, and he did not present any letters of introduction, but in the letter to Naranjo Gayon introduced him as "undertaking a trip to Mexico on special mission to General Felix Diaz and Aurelio Blanquet," and requested that he "supply him the necessary information to enable him to make his trip as quickly as possible."

The letter which he gave to Averitt addressed to General Blanquet opens with this paragraph:

"The bearer, Mr. Foster Averitt, Marine Guard of the United States, will inform you about the reasons for his trip and of the work we are undertaking here. I kindly request from you, after meeting Mr. Foster [sic], to be good enough to introduce him to General Felix Diaz, as he wants to take up some matters with both of you."

The remainder of the letter explains how he had given publicity to "the recent successful arrival" of the General in Mexico and the motives inspiring the movement of reorganization under the leadership of General Diaz. It predicts early recognition by our government of the belligerency of the Diaz insurgents, and urges the General to write as often as possible to enable "us to continue our campaign of propaganda."

Supplied with these letters, Averitt straightway went to San Antonio and presented his letter to Naranjo, who, [176] after some conferences with him, gave him a letter to General Santiago Mendoza, at Laredo, on the border. This letter was presented to Mendoza, and through him arrangements were made for Averitt's crossing into Mexico with two or three others, but they were arrested by customs guards and the proceedings we are considering followed.

In the interviews in New York there was suggestion of payment of expenses and a commission for Averitt, but Gayon, saying that the furnishing of either would violate the neutrality laws of the United States, told him there would be no difficulty in his getting a commission from General Blanquet on his arrival in Mexico, and the last thing he said to him when leaving was "that he expected that he should be at least a colonel when he saw him again down there." He told him it might be possible to have his expenses made up to him when he arrived in Mexico, and, as a matter of fact, he received $15 from General Mendoza at Laredo.

The statute which Gayon is charged with violating provides that "whoever within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States . . . hires or retains another . . . to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted . . . in the service of any foreign . . . people" shall be punished as provided. And the overt acts charged in the indictment are: that Gayon delivered to Averitt at New York a letter addressed to Naranjo, and at the same time gave him instructions with respect to presenting it, and impliedly promised Averitt that upon his arrival in Mexico he would be given a commission in the army of General Blanquet; that at the same time he delivered to Averitt a letter addressed to General Blanquet, who was then in Mexico, in command of revolutionary forces; that Averitt visited and held conferences with Naranjo, who gave him a letter to Mendoza, at Laredo, in the southern district of [177] Texas; and that Averitt, under instructions received from Naranjo, called upon and conferred with Mendoza at Laredo, and with him arranged to enter Mexico with others, with intent to join the forces of Diaz under General Blanquet.

While the narration of what took place between Gayon and Averitt does not show a hiring of the latter in the ordinary sense of the word, yet, when taken with the conduct of Averitt in going immediately to Texas, and in attempting to cross into Mexico, plainly, it tends to show that Gayon retained Averitt in the sense of engaging him to go to Mexico, that he was induced to enter into that engagement by the promise that he would be given a commission in the forces of Diaz when he arrived there, and that he would probably be reimbursed for his expenses.

There was also evidence tending to show that by communication and concerted action between Gayon, Naranjo, and Mendoza, Averitt was induced to go from New York to the border, and would have succeeded in reaching Mexico and joining the insurgent forces but for the vigilance of the United States officers who arrested him. The evidence also is that Mendoza conferred with Averitt and acted in promotion of the conspiracy when in the southern district of Texas, thus establishing the jurisdiction of the court to which the indictment was returned, under Hyde v. United States, 225 U. S. 347, 56 L. ed. 1114, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 614, and Brown v. Elliott, 225 U. S. 392, 56 L. ed. 1136, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 812.

The word "retain" is used in the statute as an alternative to "hire," and means something different from the usual employment with payment in money. One may be retained, in the sense of engaged, to render a service as effectively by a verbal as by a written promise, by a prospect for advancement or payment in the future as by the immediate payment of cash. As stated long ago by a noted Attorney General, in an opinion dealing with this statute:

[178] "A party may be retained by verbal promise or by invitation for a declared or known purpose. If such a statute could be evaded or set at naught by elaborate contrivances to engage without enlisting, to retain without hiring, to invite without recruiting . . . it would be idle to pass acts of Congress for the punishment of this or any other offense." 7 Ops. Atty. Gen. pp. 367, 378, 379.

This discussion of the record makes it sufficiently clear that there was substantial evidence before the commissioner and the court, tending to show that § 10 of the Criminal Code had been violated, and that there was probable cause for believing the appellant guilty of conspiring with Naranjo and Mendoza to compass that violation, as charged in the indictment, and therefore the order of the District Court must be affirmed.

UNITED STATES EX REL. KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 178–188.)

Interstate Commerce Commission — physical valuation of railway property — present cost of condemnation or purchase — disregard of command of Congress.

The refusal of the Interstate Commerce Commission, when making the physical valuation of railway properties ordered by the Act of March 1, 1913, § 19a, to obey the command of that statute to investigate and find the present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of original cost or present value of the railway company's lands, cannot be justified on the theory that such command involves a consideration by the Commission of matters "beyond the possibility of rational determination," and calls for "inadmissible assumptions," and the indulging in "impossible hypotheses" as to subjects "incapable of rational ascertainment," even if it be conceded that the subject-matter of the valuations in question, which the statute expressly directed to be made, necessarily opened a wide range of proof, and called for the exercise of close scrutiny and of scrupulous analysis and application.

[Matters as to Interstate Commerce Commission, see Interstate Commerce Commission.]

Argued December 10, 1919. Decided March 8, 1920.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court of the District, refusing to compel the Interstate Commerce Commission by mandamus to investigate and find the present cost of condemnation and damages, or of purchase in excess of original cost or present value of railway property of which the Commission was making a physical valuation. Reversed with directions to reverse the judgment of the trial court and to direct that court to grant the mandamus.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Louis Marshall and Samuel W. Moore argued the cause, and, with Mr. Samuel Untermyer, filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Where, as in this case, a plain duty is imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it declines to proceed with its performance, mandamus lies to require it to act.

Interstate Commerce Commission v. United States, 224 U. S. 474, 56 L. ed. 849, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; Lane v. Hoglund, 244 U. S. 174, 61 L. ed. 1066, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558; Re Simons, 247 U. S. 231, 62 L. ed. 1094, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 497; United States ex rel. Louisville Cement Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 246 U. S. 638, 62 L. ed. 914, 38 Sup. Ct. The fact that there is no other remedy available to the plaintiff justifies its right to seek relief by mandamus.

Ex parte Harding, 219 U. S. 363, 55 L. ed. 252, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 392, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 324; Ex parte Park Square Automobile Station, 244 U. S. 412, 61 L. ed. 1231, 37 Sup. Ct. The action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in deliberately disregarding the mandate of Congress which required the Commission, in express terms, to investigate and report separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of the original cost or present value of all lands, right of way, and terminals owned or used for the purposes of a common carrier, offends the fundamental canons of statutory construction.

The Commission having found the average acreage market value of adjacent lands, and having applied it to the plaintiff's right of way, and the plaintiff having accepted this finding, it is an easy and simple process to find the present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase, and the Commission should be required to do so.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The Act of Congress of March 1, 1913 (37 Stat. at L. 701, chap. 92, Comp. Stat. § 8591, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 495), amending the Act to Regulate Commerce, imposed the duty upon the Interstate Commerce Commission (§ 19a) to "investigate, ascertain, and report the value of all property owned or used by every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act." Specifying the steps to be taken in the performance of the general duties thus imposed, the same section commanded as follows:

"First. In such investigation said Commission shall ascertain and report in detail as to each piece of property owned or used by said carrier for its purposes as a common carrier . . . the cost of reproduction new, the cost of reproduction less depreciation, and an analysis of the methods by which these several costs are obtained, and the reasons for their differences, if any . . . . . .

"Second. Such investigation and report shall state in detail and separately from improvements the original cost of all lands, rights of way, and terminals owned or used for the purposes of a common carrier, and ascertained as of the time of dedication to public use, and the present value of the same, and separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value.

"Fifth. . . . [7th and 8th par.] Whenever the Commission shall have completed the tentative valuation of the property of any common carrier, as herein directed, and before such valuation shall become final, the Commission shall give notice by registered letter to the said carrier, . . . stating the valuation placed upon the several [183] classes of property of said carrier, and shall allow thirty days in which to file a protest of the same with the Commission. . . .

"If notice of protest is filed the Commission shall fix a time for hearing the same, and shall proceed as promptly as may be to hear and consider any matter relative and material thereto . . . All final valuations by the Commission and the classification thereof shall be published and shall be prima facie evidence of the value of the property in all proceedings under the Act to Regulate Commerce as of the date of the fixing thereof, and in all judicial proceedings for the enforcement of the act approved February 4th, 1887, commonly known as 'the Act to Regulate Commerce,' and the various acts amendatory thereof, and in all judicial proceedings brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend, in whole or in part, any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Pursuant to these requirements the Commission proceeded to investigate and report the value of the property of the Kansas City Southern Railway Company. Upon completing a tentative valuation, the Commission gave the notice required by the statute to the railway company, which thereupon filed a protest against such valuation on the ground that in making it the Commission had failed to consider and include the "present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value." Upon the subject of the protest, the railway company took a large amount of testimony, and much was also taken by the Commission, both parties having incurred considerable expense in the matter.

Pending this situation, in order that the excessive expense of taking each individual parcel and showing what it would cost to acquire it or a right of way over it by purchase or condemnation might be avoided, an agreement [184] was entered into between the Director of the Bureau of Valuation of the Commission, C. A. Prouty, and the railway company, that in the event the Commission should decide that evidence upon the cost of acquiring land by purchase or condemnation would be received by it, the Bureau of Valuation would recommend to the Commission the percentage or multiplier of the naked value of the land, to be used for the purpose of reaching the railway cost of acquiring the same.

At that time there was also pending a protest concerning a tentative valuation made by the Commission as to the property of the Texas Midland Railroad Company, raising the same question as to error committed in failing to carry out the provisions of the statute concerning the present cost of condemnation, etc., in which case the Commission overruled the protest, holding that the provision of the statute in question was not susceptible of being enforced or acted upon for reasons stated by the Commission in part as follows (1 Val. Rep. pp. 54 et seq.):

"However, the direction in paragraph entitled 'Second' for the ascertainment of the present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in effect calls for a finding as to the cost of reproduction of these lands. Must this be done, and can this be done? It seems elementary that the cost of reproduction can be estimated only by assuming that the thing in question is to be produced again, and that if it is to be produced again, it is to be taken as not existent. It seems sophistry to contend that the lands of the railroad can be produced again at a cost to the railroad without first making the assumption that they are no longer lands of the railroad; and this necessary assumption carries with it the mental obliteration of the railroad itself.

"Considerable testimony was produced to the effect that in the acquisition of a railroad right of way it is necessary for the carrier to pay sums in excess of the value of [185] the land if measured by the present or market value of similar contiguous lands, and this because of the elements which have been enumerated and embraced in the protest, such as cost of acquisition, damages to the severed property, cost of buildings and other improvements, accrued taxes, and various incidental rights.

"We are unable to distinguish between what is suggested by the carrier in this record and nominally required by the act and what was condemned by the court [in the Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18] as beyond the possibility of rational determination; nor is there any essential difference in the actual methods there employed and those now urged upon us. Before we can report figures as ascertained, we must have a reasonable foundation for our estimate, and when, as here, if the estimate can be made only upon inadmissible assumptions, and upon impossible hypotheses, such as those pointed out by the Supreme Court in the opinion quoted, our duty to abstain from reporting as an ascertained fact that which is incapable of rational ascertainment is clear.

"Because of the impossibility of making the self-contradictory assumptions which the theory requires when applied to the carrier's lands, we are unable to report the reproduction cost of such lands or its equivalent, the present cost of acquisition and damages, or of purchase in excess of present value. The present value of lands as found by us appears in the final valuation, appended hereto."

Applying the ruling thus made to the protest which was pending in this case, the Commission gave notice to the railway that the agreement made with the Director of the Bureau of Valuation concerning the method of proof would be treated as not further operative; and thereafter, when an offer was made by the railway before an examiner [186] of the Commission of further testimony concerning the subject in hand, it was excluded because in conflict with the ruling announced in the Midland Case. The Commission sustained this action of the examiner on the ground that that officer had rightly held that the ruling in the Midland Case was controlling; and the Commission therefore decided that no further testimony on the particular subject would be heard in this case, and that it would make no report concerning that subject.

This suit was then brought to obtain a mandamus to compel the Commission to hear the proof and act upon it under the statute. The amended petition, after reciting the facts as we have outlined them and making the appropriate formal averments to justify resort to mandamus, alleged:

"That the refusal of respondent to investigate and find such present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of original cost or present value of relator's lands will result in great wrong and injury to relator; by way of illustration, such refusal will result in a finding by respondent of a value of but $60,000 with respect to parcels of land acquired by relator by judicial award in condemnation proceedings during four years immediately preceding such valuation at an actual cost to relator of $180,000; and in the aggregate will result in a finding with respect to said lands at least $5,000,000 less than the value so directed by the act of Congress above mentioned to be found."

It was further averred, with considerable elaboration, that the petitioner stood ready to produce proof to meet the requirements of the statute which was neither speculative nor impossible to be acted upon, since it would conform to the character of proof usually received in judicial proceedings involving the exercise of eminent domain.

The Commission in its answer, either stating or conceding [187] the history of the case as we have recited it, and summarily reiterating the grounds for the refusal by the Commission to receive the proof or report concerning it, challenged the right to the relief sought. A demurrer to the answer as stating no defense was overruled by the trial court, which denied relief without opinion. In the court of appeals, two judges sitting, the judgment of the trial court was affirmed by a divided court, also without opinion, and the case is here on writ of error to review that judgment.

It is obvious from the statement we have made, as well as from the character of the remedy invoked,—mandamus,—that we are required to decide, not a controversy growing out of duty performed under the statute, but one solely involving an alleged refusal to discharge duties which the statute exacts. Admonishing, as this does, that the issue before us is confined to a consideration of the face of the statute and the nonaction of the Commission in a matter purely ministerial, it serves also to furnish a ready solution of the question to be decided, since it brings out in bold contrast the direct and express command of the statute to the Commission, to act concerning the subject in hand, and the Commission's unequivocal refusal to obey such command.

It is true that the Commission held that its nonaction was caused by the fact that the command of the statute involved a consideration by it of matters "beyond the possibility of rational determination," and called for "inadmissible assumptions," and the indulging in "impossible hypotheses" as to subjects "incapable of rational ascertainment," and that such conclusions were the necessary consequence of the Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard), 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18.

We are of opinion, however, that, considering the face of the statute and the reasoning of the Commission, it results that the conclusion of the Commission was erroneous, an error which was exclusively caused by a mistaken [188] conception by the Commission of its relation to the subject, resulting in an unconscious disregard on its part of the power of Congress and an unwitting assumption by the Commission of authority which it did not possess. And the significance which the Commission attributed to the ruling in the Minnesota Rate Cases, even upon the assumption that its view of the ruling in those cases was not a mistaken one, but illustrates in a different form the disregard of the power of Congress which we have just pointed out, since, as Congress indisputably had the authority to impose upon the Commission the duty in question, it is impossible to conceive how the Minnesota Rate ruling could furnish ground for refusing to carry out the commands of Congress, the cogency of which consideration is none the less manifest though it be borne in mind that the Minnesota Rate Cases were decided after the passage of the act in question.

Finally, even if it be further conceded that the subject-matter of the valuations in question which the act of Congress expressly directed to be made necessarily opened a wide range of proof, and called for the exercise of close scrutiny and of scrupulous analysis in its consideration and application, such assumption, we are of opinion, affords no basis for refusing to enforce the act of Congress, or what is equivalent thereto, of exerting the general power which the act of Congress gave, and at the same time disregarding the essential conditions imposed by Congress upon its exercise.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is therefore reversed with directions to reverse that of the Supreme Court, and direct the Supreme Court to grant a writ of mandamus in conformity with this opinion.

[189] MARK EISNER, as Collector of United States Internal Revenue for the Third District of the State of New York, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MYRTLE H. MACOMBER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 189–238.)

Internal revenue — income tax — stock dividends.

1. Congress was given no power by the income tax amendment to the Federal Constitution to tax, without apportionment, as income of a stockholder in a corporation, a stock dividend made lawfully and in good faith against accumulated profits earned by the corporation since the adoption of such amendment. Such dividends are not income.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, I. b; III. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Internal revenue — construction of income tax amendment — apportionment of direct tax.

2. The income tax amendment to the Federal Constitution should not be extended by loose construction so as to repeal or modify, except as applied to income, those provisions of the Constitution that require an apportionment according to population for direct taxes upon property, real and personal.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, I. b; III. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

Internal revenue — apportionment of direct tax — stockholder's interest in undivided profits.

3. The constitutional inhibition against the taxation by Congress without apportionment of a stockholder's interest in the undivided accumulated earnings of a corporation is not removed by the adoption of the income tax amendment.

[For other cases, see Internal Revenue, I. b; III. b, in Digest Sup. Ct. 1908.]

[No. 318.]

Argued April 16, 1919. Restored to docket for reargument May 19, 1919. Reargued October 17 and 20, 1919. Decided March 8, 1920.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action against a collector of internal revenue to recover back the amount of an income tax paid on a stock dividend. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Assistant Attorney General Frierson argued the cause and filed a brief for plaintiff in error:

Income, in general, as used in both the Corporation Excise Tax Law of 1909 and the Income Tax Law of 1913, has been defined as the gain derived from capital, from labor, or from both combined.

Stratton's Independence v. Howbert, 231 U. S. 399, 415, 58 L. ed. 285, 292, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Doyle v. Mitchell Bros. Co. 247 U. S. 183, 185, 62 L. ed. 1058, 1059, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 467.

Stockholders have such an interest in the earnings and profits of a corporation that the same are within the power of Congress to tax as income even before they are divided.

Collector v. Hubbard (Brainard v. Hubbard) 12 Wall. 1, 20 L. ed. 272; Southern P. Co. v. Lowe, 247 U. S. 330, 336, 62 L. ed. 1142, 1147, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; Lynch v. Turrish, 247 U. S. 221, 228, 62 L. ed. 1087, 1092, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537; Bailey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 22 Wall. 604, 635, 636, 22 L. ed. 840, 848, 849; Lynch v. Hornby, 247 U. S. 339, 343, 62 L. ed. 1149, 1151, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 543.

Congress having the right to tax undivided profits, this right cannot be destroyed by the issuance of stock certificates to represent such undivided profits, and since the certificates of stock issued in this case represent earnings of the corporation accruing subsequent to March 1, 1913, they are clearly made taxable as income by the Act of 1916.

Towne v. Eisner, 245 U. S. 418, 62 L. ed. 372, L.R.A.1918D, 254, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158, does not control this case.

(1) That case merely decides that the stock dividends then before the court, paid out of earnings accruing prior to March 1, 1913, were not income within the meaning of the Act of 1913. Nothing said in the opinion can be construed as challenging the power of Congress to tax, as the income of stockholders, the profits of a corporation even before they are divided, and much less to tax a certificate of stock issued to represent such profits.

(2) The most that can be said of the opinion is that it holds that the term "dividend," in its ordinary acceptation, does not include stock dividends, and that since the Act of 1913 used the term "dividend" without qualification, stock dividends were not taxable under it.

Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 559, 560, 34 L. ed. 525, 527, 528, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057.

(3) The Act of 1916, however, expressly taxes stock dividends, and hence Towne v. Eisner, supra, is not controlling.

See also note to this case as reported in 9 A.L.R. 1594.

The case of Lynch v. Hornby, 247 U. S. 339, 62 L. ed. 1149, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 543, holding that cash dividends are to be treated as income for the year in which received, whether paid out of earnings accruing before or after March 1, 1913, in view of the reasons stated for the holding, would not have been inconsistent with a holding that stock dividends were taxable when representing earnings accruing after March 1, 1913, but not taxable when representing earnings accruing before that date. But whether such holdings would have been inconsistent or not, the holding in Lynch v. Hornby, supra, is not controlling in this case, since the Act of 1916 makes it plain that dividends, whether paid in cash or stock, are to be taxed only when they represent earnings accruing after March 1, 1913.

While Gibbons v. Mahon, supra, holds that, as between a life tenant and a remainderman, stock dividends are not income, that case arose in the District of Columbia, involves no Federal question, and is not controlling in similar cases arising in the state courts. As a matter of fact, most of the state courts have adopted a different ruling and hold that stock dividends are income. In the Act of 1916, therefore, Congress was clearly within its power when it declared that by "dividends" it meant either cash or stock dividends, in accordance with the meaning of the term as understood and construed by the courts of most of the states.

Rep. 164; Paris v. Paris, 10 Ves. Jr. 185, 32 Eng. Reprint, 815; Tax. Comr. v. Putnam (Trefry v. Putnam) 227 Mass. 522, L.R.A.1917F, 806, 116 N. E. 904; Re Osborne, 209 N. Mr. Charles E. Hughes argued the cause, and, with Mr. George Welwood Murray, filed a brief for defendant in error:

The tax is sought to be laid upon the property in question solely by reason of ownership, and cannot be sustained unless it is authorized by the 16th Amendment.

The fundamental fact is that there was no gain or income to the defendant in error by virtue of the receipt of the additional shares constituting the stock dividend. The value of the shares held by the defendant in error was not increased by the increase in the number of shares. The shareholder was no richer than before.

The tax cannot be sustained as a tax laid upon the shareholder's interest in the undivided profits of the corporation. Apart from the serious question of the validity of such a tax, as an income tax, that was not the scheme of the act. It is sought to lay the tax in question upon the so-called "stock dividend" per se; that is, upon the mere readjustment of the evidence of a capital interest already owned.

So far as the present question is concerned, the word "income" in the 16th Amendment has no broader meaning than the word "income" in the Income Tax Act of 1913, under which the question arose in the Towne Case.

Of course it is not denied that income may be in the form of property, although it is well settled that, in construing an Income Tax Act, income is taken to mean money in the absence of any special provision of law to the contrary, and not the mere expectation of receiving it (United States v. Schillinger, 14 Blatchf. 71, Fed. Cas. No. 16,228). If, however, the act reaches property, and not simply money, it must still be property that constitutes gain or income. It is not income simply because it is property.

The courts have always recognized that mere appreciation in value of capital assets is not to be called income.

Messrs. George W. Wickersham and Charles Robinson Smith filed a brief as amici curiæ:

The principle laid down by this court in two well-considered cases (Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. ed. 525, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057, and Towne v. Eisner, 245 U. S. 418, 62 L. ed. 372, L.R.A.1918D, 254, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158), that stock dividends represent capital, and do not constitute income, is based on sound economic reasoning.

Seligman, Principles of Economics, 7th ed. pp. 16, 17; Fisher, Nature of Capital & Income, p. 103; Seligman, Are Stock Dividends Income? reprinted from September. 1919, number of American Economic Review; 3 Bulletin of National Tax Asso. April-June, 1918, pp. 161, 237, 240.

If gains in general and paper gains may properly be considered income, then this would hold true of mere appreciation in value of real estate or of personal property that is not sold,—a gain that is not realized. But this sort of appreciation or gain in capital value can never constitute income within the 16th Amendment.

Gray v. Darlington, 15 Wall. 63, 21 L. ed. 45; Lynch v. Turrish, 247 U. S. 221, 231, 62 L. ed. 1087, 1093, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537; Baldwin Locomotive Works v. McCoach, 136 C. C. A. 660, 221 Fed. 59; Towne v. Eisner, 245 U. S. 418, 62 L. ed. 372, L.R.A.1918D, 254, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158.

It cannot be doubted that the sort of gain referred to by this court as constituting income was a realized gain,—not the gain of mere appreciation in value.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents the question whether, by virtue of the 16th Amendment, Congress has the power to tax, as income of the stockholder and without apportionment, a stock dividend made lawfully and in good faith against profits accumulated by the corporation since March 1, 1913.

It arises under the Revenue Act of September 8, 1916 (chap. 463, 39 Stat. at L. 756 et seq., Comp. Stat. § 6336a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 312), which, in our opinion (notwithstanding a contention of the government that will be [200] noticed), plainly evinces the purpose of Congress to tax stock dividends as income.[1] [1] Title I.—Income Tax.

Part I.—On Individuals.

Sec. 2 (a) That, subject only to such exemptions and deductions as are hereinafter allowed, the net income of a taxable person shall include gains, profits, and income de-

The facts, in outline, are as follows: On January 1, 1916, the Standard Oil Company of California, a corporation of that state, out of an authorized capital stock of $100,000,000, had shares of stock outstanding, par value $100 each, amounting in round figures to $50,000,000. In addition, it had surplus and undivided profits invested in plant, property, and business, and required for the purposes of the corporation, amounting to about $45,000,000, of which about $20,000,000 had been earned prior to March 1, 1913, the balance thereafter. In January, 1916, in order to readjust the capitalization, the board of directors decided to issue additional shares sufficient to constitute a stock dividend of 50 per cent of the outstanding stock, and to transfer from surplus account to capital stock account an amount equivalent to such issue. Appropriate resolutions were adopted, an amount equivalent to the par value of the proposed new stock was transferred accordingly, and the new stock duly issued against it and divided among the stockholders.

Defendant in error, being the owner of 2,200 shares of the old stock, received certificates for 1,100 additional [201] shares, of which 18.07 per cent, or 198.77 shares, par value $19,877, were treated as representing surplus earned between March 1, 1913, and January 1, 1916. She was called upon to pay, and did pay under protest, a tax imposed under the Revenue Act of 1916, based upon a supposed income of $19,877 because of the new shares; and an appeal to the commissioner of internal revenue having been disallowed, she brought action against the collector to recover the tax. In her complaint she alleged the above facts, and contended that in imposing such a tax the Revenue Act of 1916 violated art. 1, § 2, cl. 3, and art. 1, § 9, cl. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, requiring direct taxes to be apportioned according to population, and that the stock dividend was not income within the meaning of the 16th Amendment. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled upon the authority of Towne v. Eisner, 245 U. S. 418, 62 L. ed. 372, L.R.A.1918D, 254, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158; and, defendant having failed to plead further, final judgment went against him. To review it, the present writ of error is prosecuted.

The case was argued at the last term, and reargued at the present term, both orally and by additional briefs.

We are constrained to hold that the judgment of the district court must be affirmed: First, because the question at issue is controlled by Towne v. Eisner, supra; secondly, because a re-examination of the question, with the additional light thrown upon it by elaborate arguments, has confirmed the view that the underlying ground of that decision is sound, that it disposes of the question here presented, and that other fundamental considerations lead to the same result.

In Towne v. Eisner, the question was whether a stock dividend made in 1914 against surplus earned prior to January 1, 1913, was taxable against the stockholder under the Act of October 3, 1913 (chap. 16, 38 Stat. at L. 114, 166, Comp. Stat. § 5291, 2 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 724), which provided (§ B, p. 167) that net income should include "dividends," and also "gains or profits and income derived [202] from any source whatever." Suit having been brought by a stockholder to recover the tax assessed against him by reason of the dividend, the district court sustained a demurrer to the complaint. 242 Fed. 702. The court treated the construction of the act as inseparable from the interpretation of the 16th Amendment; and, having referred to Income Tax Cases (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co.) 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 912, and quoted the Amendment, proceeded very properly to say (p. 704): "It is manifest that the stock dividend in question cannot be reached by the Income Tax Act, and could not, even though Congress expressly declared it to be taxable as income, unless it is in fact income." It declined, however, to accede to the contention that in Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. ed. 525, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057, "stock dividends" had received a definition sufficiently clear to be controlling, treated the language of this court in that case as obiter dictum in respect of the matter then before it (p. 706), and examined the question as res nova, with the result rived . . . , also from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever: Provided, That the term "dividends" as used in this title shall be held to mean any distribution made or ordered to be made by a corporation, . . . out of its earnings or profits accrued since March first, nineteen hundred and thirteen, and payable to its shareholders, whether in cash or in stock of the corporation, . . . which stock dividend shall be considered income, to the amount of its cash value.

stated. When the case came here, after overruling a motion to dismiss, made by the government upon the ground that the only question involved was the construction of the statute, and not its constitutionality, we dealt upon the merits with the question of construction only, but disposed of it upon consideration of the essential nature of a stock dividend, disregarding the fact that the one in question was based upon surplus earnings that accrued before the 16th Amendment took effect. Not only so, but we rejected the reasoning of the district court, saying (245 U. S. p. 426): "Notwithstanding the thoughtful discussion that the case received below, we cannot doubt that the dividend was capital as well for the purposes of the Income Tax Law as for distribution between tenant for life and remainderman. What was said by this court upon the latter question is equally true for the former. 'A stock dividend really takes nothing from the property of the corporation, and adds nothing to the [203] interests of the shareholders. Its property is not diminished, and their interests are not increased. . . . The proportional interest of each shareholder remains the same. The only change is in the evidence which represents that interest, the new shares and the original shares together representing the same proportional interest that the original shares represented before the issue of the new ones. Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 559, 560, 34 L. ed. 525, 527, 528, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057. In short, the corporation is no poorer and the stockholder is no richer than they were before. Logan County v. United States, 169 U. S. 255, 261, 42 L. ed. 737, 739, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 361. If the plaintiff gained any small advantage by the change, it certainly was not an advantage of $417,450, the sum upon which he was taxed. . . . What has happened is that the plaintiff's old certificates have been split up in effect and have diminished in value to the extent of the value of the new."

This language aptly answered not only the reasoning of the district court, but the argument of the Solicitor General in this court, which discussed the essential nature of a stock dividend. And if, for the reasons thus expressed, such a dividend is not to be regarded as "income" or "dividends" within the meaning of the Act of 1913, we are unable to see how it can be brought within the meaning of "incomes" in the 16th Amendment; it being very clear that Congress intended in that act to exert its power to the extent permitted by the Amendment. In Towne v. Eisner it was not contended that any construction of the statute could make it narrower than the constitutional grant; rather the contrary.

The fact that the dividend was charged against profits earned before the Act of 1913 took effect, even before the Amendment was adopted, was neither relied upon nor alluded to in our consideration of the merits in that case. Not only so, but had we considered that a stock dividend constituted income in any true sense, it would have been held taxable under the Act of 1913 notwithstanding it was [204] based upon profits earned before the Amendment. We ruled at the same term, in Lynch v. Hornby, 247 U. S. 339, 62 L. ed. 1149, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 543, that a cash dividend extraordinary in amount, and in Peabody v. Eisner, 247 U. S. 347, 62 L. ed. 1152, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 546, that a dividend paid in stock of another company, were taxable as income although based upon earnings that accrued before adoption of the Amendment. In the former case, concerning "corporate profits that accumulated before the act took effect," we declared (pp. 343, 344): "Just as we deem the legislative intent manifest to tax the stockholder with respect to such accumulations only if and when, and to the extent that, his interest in them comes to fruition as income, that is, in dividends declared, so we can perceive no constitutional obstacle that stands in the way of carrying out this intent when dividends are declared out of a pre-existing surplus. . . . Congress was at liberty under the Amendment to tax as income, without apportionment, everything that became income, in the ordinary sense of the word, after the adoption of the Amendment, including dividends received in the ordinary course by a stockholder from a corporation, even though they were extraordinary in amount and might appear upon analysis to be a mere realization in possession of an inchoate and contingent interest that the stockholder had in a surplus of corporate assets previously existing." In Peabody v. Eisner (pp. 349, 350), we observed that the decision of the district court in Towne v. Eisner had been reversed "only upon the ground that it related to a stock dividend which in fact took nothing from the property of the corporation and added nothing to the interest of the shareholder, but merely changed the evidence which represented that interest;" and we distinguished the Peabody Case from the Towne Case upon the ground that "the dividend of Baltimore & Ohio shares was not a stock dividend, but a distribution in specie of a portion of the assets of the Union Pacific."

Therefore, Towne v. Eisner cannot be regarded as turning [205] upon the point that the surplus accrued to the company before the act took effect and before adoption of the Amendment. And what we have quoted from the opinion in that case cannot be regarded as obiter dictum, it having furnished the entire basis for the conclusion reached. We adhere to the view then expressed, and might rest the present case there; not because that case in terms decided the constitutional question, for it did not; but because the conclusion there reached as to the essential nature of a stock dividend necessarily prevents its being regarded as income in any true sense.

Nevertheless, in view of the importance of the matter, and the fact that Congress in the Revenue Act of 1916 declared (39 Stat. at L. 757, chap. 463, Comp. Stat. § 6336b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 312) that a "stock dividend shall be considered income, to the amount of its cash value," we will deal at length with the constitutional question, incidentally testing the soundness of our previous conclusion.

The 16th Amendment must be construed in connection with the taxing clauses of the original Constitution and the effect attributed to them before the Amendment was adopted. In Income Tax Cases (Pollock v. Farmers Loan & T. Co.) 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 912, under the Act of August, 27, 1894 (chap. 349, § 27, 28 Stat. at L. 509, 553), it was held that taxes upon rents and profits of real estate and upon returns from investments of personal property were in effect direct taxes upon the property from which such income arose, imposed by reason of ownership; and that Congress could not impose such taxes without apportioning them among the states according to population, as required by art. 1, § 2, cl. 3, and § 9, cl. 4, of the original Constitution.

Afterwards, and evidently in recognition of the limitation upon the taxing power of Congress thus determined, the 16th Amendment was adopted, in words lucidly expressing the object to be accomplished: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among [206] the several states, and without regard to any census or enumeration." As repeatedly held, this did not extend the taxing power to new subjects, but merely removed the necessity which otherwise might exist for an apportionment among the states of taxes laid on income. Brushaber v. Union P. R. Co. 240 U. S. 1, 17–19, 60 L. ed. 493, 501, 502, L.R.A.1917D, 414, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 713; Stanton v. Baltic Min. Co. 240 U. S. 103, 112 et seq., 60 L. ed. 546, 553, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278; William E. Peck & Co. v. Lowe, 247 U. S. 165, 172, 173, 62 L. ed. 1049–1051, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432.

A proper regard for its genesis, as well as its very clear language, requires also that this Amendment shall not be extended by loose construction, so as to repeal or modify, except as applied to income, those provisions of the Constitution that require an apportionment according to population for direct taxes upon property, real and personal. This limitation still has an appropriate and important function, and is not to be overridden by Congress or disregarded by the courts.

In order, therefore, that the clauses cited from article 1 of the Constitution may have proper force and effect, save only as modified by the Amendment, and that the latter also may have proper effect, it becomes essential to distinguish between what is and what is not "income," as the term is there used; and to apply the distinction, as cases arise, according to truth and substance, without regard to form. Congress cannot by any definition it may adopt conclude the matter, since it cannot by legislation alter the Constitution, from which alone it derives its power to legislate, and within whose limitations alone that power can be lawfully exercised.

The fundamental relation of "capital" to "income" has been much discussed by economists, the former being likened to the tree or the land, the latter to the fruit or the crop; the former depicted as a reservoir supplied from springs, the latter as the outlet stream, to be measured by its flow during a period of time. For the present purpose we require only a clear definition of the term "income," [207] as used in common speech, in order to determine its meaning in the Amendment; and, having formed also a correct judgment as to the nature of a stock dividend, we shall find it easy to decide the matter at issue.

After examining dictionaries in common use (Bouvier's Law Dict.; Standard Dict.; Webster's Int. Dict.; Century Dict.), we find little to add to the succinct definition adopted in two cases arising under the Corporation Tax Act of August 5, 1909 [36 Stat. at L. 11, chap. 6], (Stratton's Independence v. Howbert, 231 U. S. 399, 415, 58 L. ed. 285, 292, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Doyle v. Mitchell Bros. Co. 247 U. S. 179, 185, 62 L. ed. 1054, 1059, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 467): "Income may be defined as the gain derived from capital, from labor, or from both combined," provided it be understood to include profit gained through a sale or conversion of capital assets, to which it was applied in the Doyle Case (pp. 183, 185).

Brief as it is, it indicates the characteristic and distinguishing attribute of income, essential for a correct solution of the present controversy. The government, although basing its argument upon the definition as quoted, placed chief emphasis upon the word "gain," which was extended to include a variety of meanings; while the significance of the next three words was either overlooked or misconceived,—"derived—from—capital,"—"the gain—derived—from—capital," etc. Here we have the essential matter: not a gain accruing to capital, not a growth or increment of value in the investment; but a gain, a profit, something of exchangeable value proceeding from the property, severed from the capital, however invested or employed, and coming in, being "derived," that is, received or drawn by the recipient (the taxpayer) for his separate use, benefit, and disposal; that is income derived from property. Nothing else answers the description.

The same fundamental conception is clearly set forth in the 16th Amendment —"incomes, from whatever source derived,"—the essential thought being expressed [208] with a conciseness and lucidity entirely in harmony with the form and style of the Constitution.

Can a stock dividend, considering its essential character, be brought within the definition? To answer this, regard must be had to the nature of a corporation and the stockholder's relation to it. We refer, of course, to a corporation such as the one in the case at bar, organized for profit, and having a capital stock divided into shares to which a nominal or par value is attributed.

Certainly the interest of the stockholder is a capital interest, and his certificates of stock are but the evidence of it. They state the number of shares to which he is entitled and indicate their par value and how the stock may be transferred. They show that he or his assignors, immediate or remote, have contributed capital to the enterprise, that he is entitled to a corresponding interest proportionate to the whole,—entitled to have the property and business of the company devoted during the corporate existence to attainment of the common objects,—entitled to vote at stockholders' meetings, to receive dividends out of the corporation's profits if and when declared, and, in the event of liquidation, to receive a proportionate share of the net assets, if any, remaining after paying creditors. Short of liquidation, or until dividend declared, he has no right to withdraw any part of either capital or profits from the common enterprise; on the contrary, his interest pertains not to any part, divisible or indivisible, but to the entire assets, business, and affairs of the company. Nor is it the interest of an owner in the assets themselves, since the corporation has full title, legal and equitable, to the whole. The stockholder has the right to have the assets employed in the enterprise, with the incidental rights mentioned; but, as stockholder, he has no right to withdraw, only the right to persist, subject to the risks of the enterprise, and looking only to dividends for his return. If he desires to dissociate himself [209] from the company, he can do so only by disposing of his stock.

For bookkeeping purposes, the company acknowledges a liability in form to the stockholders equivalent to the aggregate par value of their stock, evidenced by a "capital stock account." If profits have been made and not divided, they create additional bookkeeping liabilities under the head of "profit and loss," "undivided profits," "surplus account," or the like. None of these, however, gives to the stockholders as a body, much less to any one of them, either a claim against the going concern for any particular sum of money, or a right to any particular portion of the assets or any share in them unless or until the directors conclude that dividends shall be made and a part of the company's assets segregated from the common fund for the purpose. The dividend normally is payable in money, under exceptional circumstances in some other divisible property; and when so paid, then only (excluding, of course, a possible advantageous sale of his stock or winding-up of the company) does the stockholder realize a profit or gain which becomes his separate property, and thus derive income from the capital that he or his predecessor has invested.
